THE MUSICAL TIMES

JANUARY 1, 1886.

THE FAUST LEGEND, AND ITS MUSICAL TREATMENT BY COMPOSERS.

By F. CORDER.

SUPERSTITION is the inevitable accompaniment of ignorance. The primitive man, the untutored savage in all ages, and the London ragamuffin of to-day have this much in common, that knowing nothing they are prepared to believe anything. Knowledge is such a mysterious attribute in the minds of the ignorant that they are ready to accept its possessor as a superior being—a god or a devil. Rather the latter than the former, however, for it is the curious property of the human mind to be far readier in acknowledging evil than good influences. So throughout the history of the world every man who has succeeded in piercing the dense mists of ignorance and religious dogma has always been considered to have allied himself with the powers of evil, and every savage tribe has its conjuror or devil-man who is looked on with mingled feelings of reverence and repugnance. It was of course natural for the priests of every age to endeavour to keep the monopoly of knowledge, and this is the reason why the traditions of sorcery and ill-gotten wisdom lasted as long as the supremacy of the Church. The Middle Ages gave birth to numerous legends of this kind, and by a mere chance one of the victims of this undeserved reprobation became immortalised in both poetry and prose.

It was in 1587 that an unknown partisan of the Reformed Church produced a highly interesting and moral work of fictitious biography in which we can discern three separate aims, first to instruct and edify the general public, secondly to rebuke the impious seekers after knowledge, and thirdly to administer a slap in the face to the Romanists. He succeeded admirably in accomplishing all of his objects. This book was a collection of mediæval legends of sorcery compiled (for in those days authors rarely invented their material) in the form of a biography. The author took as his hero a real personage of the time, about whom very little was known save that he was generally regarded, from his unusual powers of mind, as having been a sorcerer. This person was one John Faust, a doctor of theology, and who from the similarity of the names was afterwards wrongly confounded with John Fust, one of the inventors of printing. The following is a literal translation of the title of this very celebrated book:

The History of Dr. Johann Faust, the far-famed Magician and Necromancer. How he bound himself to belong to the Devil at a certain time, and what marvellous Adventures he made and went through in the meanwhile until he at last received his well-deserved Reward. Mostly compiled from his own Writings and published for an awful Instance, a fearful Example and an earnest Warning to all arrogant, light-minded and godless Men. James III. Submit yourselves therefore to God. Resist the Devil and he will flee from you. Cum gratia et Privilegio, imprinted at Frankfort-on-the-Main by Johann Speig. 1587.

The best proof of the extraordinary popularity which this book obtained is the fact that it was immediately translated into English, Dutch, French, and Flemish, and soon followed by a sequel, known as the "Wagner-buch" which gave further accounts of the doings of Faust and his servant Wagner. The English translation, entitled "The History of the Damnable Life and Deserved Death of Doctor John Faustus," is of course now a rare book, but it has been reprinted in Thoms' "Early English Prose Romances" along with other Faust literature of exceeding interest.

John Faust, or Faustus, it appears, was educated for the Church, which accounts for his being a man of learning, but "being of a naughty mind and otherwise addicted" he began to search into forbidden lore until finally he discovered how to invoke evil spirits. Accordingly he repaired to the legitimate spot for his undertaking, a "cross-road" (a conformation which, one would think, ought rather to be holy than evil), and so vigorously used his spells and incantations that a "fiery globe" appeared before him. Stimulated by success, Faust renewed his conjurations till at length this globe "suddenly opened and sprang up in the height of a man, so burning a time in the end it converted to the shape of a fiery man. This pleasant beast ran about the circle a great while and lastly appeared in the manner of a Grey Fryar, asking Faustus what was his request." A meeting being arranged at Faust's house the magician returned home well pleased with the success of his labours. "He thought the Devil was not so black as they use to paint him, nor hell so hot as the people say."

Mephistopheles visited Faust according to promise and a covenant was entered into, the devil agreeing to serve the magician for twenty-four years and afterwards to take possession of him; this agreement was afterwards put into writing and duly signed. "A pitiful case, Christian reader, for certainly this letter or obligation was found in his house after his most lamentable end . . . wherefore I wish all Christians to take example by this wicked doctor, and to be comforted in Christ," &c. The author comments gravely in this style after each incident in the book, the more absurd the incident the more seriously does he moralise. We are then given a specimen of the manner in which Mephistopheles entertained his victim.

"Dr. Faustus sitting pensive, having but one only boy with him, suddenly there appeared his spirit Mephistophiles in likeness of a very man, from whom issued most horrible fiery flames, insomuch that the boy was afraid, but being hardened by his master, he bid him stand still and he should have no harm; this spirit began to bleat as in a singing manner. This pretty sport pleased Dr. Faustus well; but he would not call his spirit into his counting house until he had seen more. Anon was heard a rushing of armed men and trampling of horses, this ceasing, came a kennel of hounds, and they chased a great hart into the hall and there the hart was slain. Faustus took heart, came forth and looked upon the hart, but presently before him there was a lion and a dragon together, fighting so fiercely that Faustus thought they would have thrown down the house; but the dragon overcame the lion and so they vanished. . . . Afterward followed a great old ape; this ape offered Faustus the hand, but he refused, so the ape ran out of the hall again. . . . Lastly was heard by Faustus all manner of instruments of musick, as organs, clariglolds, lutes, viols, citterns, waits, hornpipes, flutes, anomes, harps, and all manner of other instruments, which so ravished his mind that he thought he had been in another world, forgot both body and soul, insomuch that he was minded never to change his opinion concerning that which he had done. Hereat came Mephistophiles into the hall to Faustus in apparel like unto a fryar, to whom Faustus spake, thou hast done me a wonderful pleasure in shewing me this pastime; if thou continue as thou hast begun thou shalt win my heart and soul, yea and have it." The worthy magician seems to have had singular ideas of pleasure, though certainly later on his taste became somewhat more refined. The text of the famous agreement is next given and further details of its signature. Faust "set his Blood in a Saucer on warm ashes and wrote" a very lawyer-like covenant, and "thus the spirit and Faustus were agreed and dwelt together; no doubt," concludes the author with quiet irony, "there was a virtuous housekeeping."

Faust kept a boy with him, "an unhappy wag called Christopher Wagner," and this servant becomes the hero of several "second parts" of Faust. These two, aided by Mephistopheles, stole whatever they took a fancy to and played all manner of silly pranks. "Besides that Faustus was become so cunning that when he opened his window what fowl soever he wished for it came presently flying into the house, were it never so dainty. . . All their maintenance was but stolen and borrowed ware; and thus they lived an odious life in the sight of God." Soon after this Faust took it into his head to wish for a wife, at which the devil took terrible umbrage, and visited him with grotesque horrors until he was brought to a more sensible frame of mind. It then occurred to Faust to enquire into the condition of the domain which he was to inhabit after death, and we are treated to an interesting detailed description of the infernal regions. Faust learned, too, all the secrets of nature and made and published almanacs with predictions of the weather, which predictions we are assured could be relied upon, so that Zadkiel, Old Moore, and Raphael are put to the blush. One day he fell into a despondency at thinking over the bargain he had made, and which he had certainly not yet turned to much profit; so there appeared to him—presumably to cheer his spirits—a rout of devils, of whom a number are named and their personal appearance described. As thus—"Lucifer himself sate in a manner of a man all hairy, but of a brown colour like a squirrel curled and his tail turning upwards on his back as the squirrels use; I think he could crack nuts too, like a squirrel . . . after him came Dithican; he was a short thief in form of a large bird with shining feathers and four feet; his neck was green and body red and his feet black . . . the rest of the devils were in form of unreasonable beasts, as swine, harts, bears, wolfs, &c."

From these slight samples the reader will perceive the amusing simplicity of this famous old romance; to follow the story in detail to the end would be beyond the present scope. The principal incidents, such as the wine-cellar illusion (performed in our own times by every mesmerist), the invocation of "Helen of Troy," and the struggle between the rival Powers for Faust's soul, re-appear in most modern versions; the minor incidents are simply plagiarised from every available source. Baron Reichlin-Meldegg wrote an elaborate work, analysing the Faust-book, and giving the various incidents, side by side, with their multifarious originals. Four whole volumes of Scheible's series, "Das Kloster," are devoted to "Faust," legends of various kinds, and indeed it would be beyond the powers of any bibliographer to compile a full list of the "Faust" literature up to the present time. We have here only to do with absolute versions of the legend itself. To finish our account of the original story, however, a glance at some of the remaining contents is necessary. Faust makes a tour of the world in eight days, flying through the air. The geography, pretty correct so far as the author's own travels on the Continent extend, is "considerably mixed" when more distant regions are spoken of. Of course there are numerous love adventures, of which respect for the "British matron" (whose blushes seem to have superseded those of the proverbial "young person") will not allow us to speak. The "Helen of Troy" incident, however, is very imaginative, and might have been turned to better account by the poets. Being requested, as a specimen of his powers, to call up the shade of that celebrated beauty, Faust does so, and falls violently in love with the fair ghost, so much so that he remains devoted to her all the rest of his days. After his death, however, she and the son she has borne him vanish like a dream. Faust's time having elapsed, he falls into great terror and remorse, and here the moralising of the author, put into the mouth of the hero, is really fine. He takes a solemn farewell of his numerous pupils and student friends, and retires to a little country inn; frightful sounds are heard in the night, and the next morning the magician's body is found torn to pieces. Before his death he leaves his magical books to his friend and servant, Wagner, at whose wish he also bequeaths him the services of a familiar spirit called Abercock (Auerhahn in the German original).

The speedy popularity attained by this book is proved by the fact that in the very year of its publication Christopher Marlowe dramatised it, and the Bishop of London licensed a metrical version of the story, entitled "A Ballad of the Life and Death of Faustus, the great Congerer." Marlowe is supposed to have obtained it through a company of English players, who were about that time in the service of the Duke of Saxony. His tragedy is very crude and simple, being cast in the mould of the old moralities of the period; the most childish incidents of the story, such as Faust's pranks at Rome, where he boxes the Pope's ears, eats his dinner and lights squibs under the table, and his tricks upon the horse-dealer and others are all introduced, the only really dignified portion being the last Act, in which Faust's remorse and death are depicted in language of great power and beauty, as is indeed also the case in the original prose romance. The final speech of the chorus, beginning—

Cut is the branch that might have grown full straight,
And burned is Apollo's laurel bough
That sometime grew within this learned man, is, perhaps, the only part of the tragedy familiar to the general reader through frequent quotation, but the whole of the last scene is of a very high order of poetry. This play has never, I believe, inspired any musician to write even an overture to it.

The ballad alluded to above is no longer extant, but various imitations of later date survive, among them being a chap-ballad, entitled "The just Judgement of God shew'd upon Dr. Faustus. To the tune of Fortune my Foe." One of the last verses may be quoted as a specimen. The hero tells the whole sad tale, even of his death:—

Then, presently, they came into the hall
Whereas my brains were cast against the wall,
Both arms and legs in pieces they did see,
My bowels gone, there was an end of me.

Six years later, in 1593, appeared in Germany a sequel to the Faust-book. Its full title occupies several pages, so it is generally called "The Wagnerbuch" for short. It gives some more accounts of the doings of Faust, and then relates the career of his successor, Wagner. It is more soberly and cleverly written than the first book, but scarcely so interesting. It was imitated, not translated exactly, in English, under the title of "A Second Report of Dr. Faustus and His Familiar, Wagner," with a long preface by the author, who styles himself a student of Wittenburg, but who is evidently an English country gentleman. It begins thus:—

"It is plaine that many things in the first book are meere lies, for prooffe marke this, it is said to be translated and where it is word for word. But I have talked with the man that first wrote them, having them from Wagner's very friend, wherein he saith that many things are corrupted, some added de novo, some cancelled and taken awaie, and many were augmented. As for addition to the copy is there where Mephistophiles disputeth of the number of Hells and some other disputations. And let a man marke them duly he shall find them I will not say childish, but certainly very superficial, not like the talk of Divills wherewith foldings of words they doe use to dilate at large and more subtell by farre. But as for his obligation and the most part it is certain they are most credible and out of all question."

He then gives several conclusive proofs of Faust's existence, declaring that he has seen with his own eyes the house where he lived, and the tree beneath which he used to teach his pupils, "which I think is sufficient testimony to any reasonable ear." This book is now of extreme rarity. The only reprint is that of Mr. Thoms, also scarce. The 18th century brought a higher development of the legend. The great poet Lessing attempted a drama on the subject, of which only one scene was written, but the main idea, on the testimony of friends, was to have run thus:—

In an ancient dome at midnight the devil has assembled all the spirits of hell to a carnival, at which each relates his individual achievements; one declares "I have done nothing; I have only conceived a thought more devilish than the deeds of others: I will rob God of His favourite, a youth devoted to the pursuit of truth, and for its sake renouncing every other passion." Satan exults in anticipation over the accomplishment of his design. Then a voice proclaims from on high—"Ye shall not prevail!"

It remained for Johann Wolfgang von Goethe, the poet, philosopher, alchemist, journalist, art-critic, botanist, savant, theatre director, and heaven knows what—the man whose knowledge and sympathies were almost as extensive and all-embracing as Shakespeare's—to supplement these materials with scenes and ideas suggested by, if not directly springing from, his own romantic career, and to weld the whole into two immortal art-works, of which the first is the fiery outpouring of a young and ardent human genius who looks on the world from within, and the second the cold and mystic utterance of the venerable sage who looks upon the world from without, and little heeding the real, contemplates with wrapt and serene delight those ideal worlds which are his familiar haunts. In other words the first part of Goethe's "Faust" is a poetic drama, and the second a dramatic poem—fantastic, allegorical, and profoundly obscure. Every educated Englishman is supposed to know Goethe's "Faust" almost as well as he is supposed to know his Shakespeare, but there are, as a matter of fact, considerable numbers of people who have but the vaguest acquaintance with either. As most of the musical settings of "Faust" are more or less directly inspired by Goethe's poem, and as the English reader can obtain through the best of translations only an imperfect idea of that poem—indeed, no idea at all of the second part—a plain and simple analysis of its general scope seems here advisable.

During the 17th century the "Faust" legend had sunk into the form of a play for the puppet-show, never written down, but familiar to the world as our own Punch and Judy. A toy puppet-show first introduced the boy Goethe to the immortal story, which, as he says, "murmured with many voices in his soul." This grotesque play has been given a local habitation in print by Carl Simrock, but needs no further notice, as it is very similar in its scope to Marlowe's tragedy. Containing the principal incidents of the legend it was sufficient to impress the imagination of such an ardent thinker as Goethe.

The tragedy of "Faust," then, consists of two separate portions, the first of which was very slowly composed, some isolated fragments having been penned as early as 1774, Goethe then being twenty-five years of age. It was a life-work in more than one sense, for it was the reflection of his inner self and portrayed the whole growth of his own great soul from its first wild youthful cravings for truth and happiness to the reposeful and dignified philosophy of maturity. The first part completed in 1797, Goethe re-wrote the whole during the succeeding four years, remodelling it, adding the Prologues and the Walpurgis Night scene (which certainly show themselves to be excrescences) and published it in its present form in 1806. Its principal incidents are familiar enough, though in a vulgarised and distorted form, to the modern musician, through the versions of M.M. Barbier and Carré, Berlioz and Boito. The exquisite lyrics which abound in it have been seized upon by every composer, but the drama as a whole is too complicated and subtle to afford a satisfactory basis for a musical work without alterations which rob it of much of its beauty.

The opening prologue in the theatre is a dialogue on popular taste between the manager, the poet, and the clown (or low-comedian), which, though a keen piece of satire enough, has no connection with anything that follows. The prologue to the drama itself takes place in Heaven, and is really an adaptation of the oldest of all existing dramatic prologues, the opening of the Book of Job. The importance and depth of meaning which this idea gives to the tragedy cannot be over-estimated. We hear the songs of the archangels and heavenly hosts, and Mephistophiles, on a visit to the higher spheres, holds a conversation with God which the unpoetic may deem irreverent at the least, though it is no more so than the original. Faust being held out to us as the noblest specimen of a human soul, earnestly seeking after truth, though self-willed and ill-regulated, the devil obtains permission to tempt this struggler in any way he pleases—

Till baffled and in shame thou dost admit
A good man, clouded though his senses be
By error, is no willing slave to it.

We are then introduced to Faust in his study, the same opening as Marlowe's play. The man, or more than man, who has ransacked Nature's store house of secrets only finds that he has wasted his life. Aged and dispirited he vainly raises spirits which have no sympathy for him, vainly instructs his disciple Wagner in the knowledge whose hollowness he so bitterly feels; in an access of life-weariness he is about to drink poison and hurl himself into a better world, or into nothingness, when Easter Day dawns and in the chiming bells he hears the voices of angels proclaiming "Christ is risen." Moved, not to the soul by piety, but to the heart by reminiscences of childhood's days, he is melted to tears and abandons his purpose. Scene ii. gives us a picture of burgher and peasant life, to illustrate which various groups of characters are momentarily introduced, interspersed with the song of a beggar at the town gate, a soldier's chorus, a dance and song of peasants under the linden trees, &c. Goethe seems here hardly to have caught the spirit of low life gaiety as our Elizabethan dramatists used so exquisitely to do. Faust wanders gloomily with Wagner through the merry scenes, unsoftened by the love and homage paid him by those whom he has healed; he still utters his vain repinings, till on expressing a wish for a spirit who will assist and relieve him a black poodle dog appears, and after weird circlings and gambollings adopts him for master. Scene iii. returns to Faust's study. Recognising the dog as a spirit in disguise the magician after much fantastic conjuration succeeds in making Mephistophiles present himself in more imposing form, not a ridiculous figure in flaming scarlet as we see him on the operatic stage, but as a sober travelling student.

Describing himself finely as the spirit "which evermore denies" he holds a fantastic conversation with his invoker, ending by offering, as a specimen of his powers, to give the wearied philosopher an hour's unalloyed pleasure. Here follows the chorus of sylphs, singing Faust to dreamy slumbers, which Berlioz has treated so exquisitely. Another scene laid in the same place shows how Mephistopheles pays his second visit, and makes the celebrated compact. After much metaphysical discussion Faust, in a burst of despair, curses life and all that it contains. A noble chorus of invisible spirits, "Woe, woe! thou hast destroyed it! This beautiful world!" reproves his folly, and Mephisto persuades him to mix once more with the world under happier auspices ere he renounces it. As the compact which he makes with his tempter is of a much more refined nature to that in any other version of the story, and as it is not often clearly understood, it may be as well to quote it at length, for it is, of course, the key to the whole poem:—

Faust. Comfort and quiet?—no, no! none of these
For me—I ask them not—I seek them not. . . .
Canst thou by falsehood or by flattery
Delude me into self-complacent smiles,
Cheat me into tranquillity—come then
And welcome life's last day—be this our wager. . . .
If ever time should flow so calmly on,
Soothing my spirit into such oblivion,
That in the pleasant trance I would arrest
And hail the happy moment in its course,
Bidding it linger with me—"O how fair
Art thou, delicious moment—fly not yet." . . .
Or words like these—then throw me into fetters;
Then willingly do I consent to perish;
Then is thy service at an end—and then
The clock may cease to strike—the hand to move—
For me be time then passed away for ever.

In all other versions of the legend the compact is perfectly irrational, for if Faust signs away his soul, what need is there for the Devil to tempt him to wickedness afterwards? But here is a noble poetical conception of the strife between the rival Powers for possession of the human soul. So long as Faust aspires to raise his soul above its present condition he cannot be on the road to perdition, but should the "divine discontent" cease to torment him he becomes the subject of Mephistopheles. Unfortunately the poet seems to have lost sight of his own idea, for during the remainder of the first part there is no further allusion to the compact, and no signs of its bearing on the drama.

Faust and his companion now set out on their travels. They behold first a pair of vulgar sots revelling in some "shades" at Leipzig, and Mephisto plays on them the traditional jests of drawing wine from the table and then casting a glamour over the drinkers so that they believe themselves in a lovely vineyard and tweak each other's noses in the attempt to pluck imaginary grapes. The songs of the Rat and the Flea in this scene, which Berlioz has made so much of, are characteristically vulgar, but their humour is very German—in other words, very feeble to English ideas. The travellers next are seen in a witch's kitchen, whither they have repaired to obtain a potion which will restore Faust his youth. Here Goethe's acquaintance with all appertaining to the Black Art stands him in good stead. The grotesque scene between Mephisto and the cat-apes, the old witch's familiars, forms a fine contrast to the serious interest. Faust beholds in a magic mirror a lovely female image, and in the hope of beholding its living original conquers his repugnance to the puerile mummery of witchcraft and accepts the potion. In the next scene he meets Gretchen in the street, and his rejuvenated blood fires within him. Seeking the aid of his friend to win this maiden, Mephisto artfully inflames his passion by restraining him, and finally agrees to show Faust her dwelling and to place in her room some tempting present. The scene of Gretchen's chamber, which follows, gives rise to a most beautiful soliloquy for Faust, the prototype of "Salve dimora," and the corresponding solo in Berlioz's work; but, needless to say, that in neither of these is the poetry of Goethe even to be faintly discerned. Faust's better nature reasserts itself and he renounces his evil designs, though, alas! too late. The jewels are hidden in Margaret's cupboard, where anon the maiden finds them. She is persuaded, however, that they came there by enchantment, and her mother makes her give them up to the priest. Mephisto then repairs to the house to repeat the offering, and ingratiates himself with Margaret's friend, Martha. Then follows the scene in the garden, too familiar to need dwelling upon. The lovers confess their passion, Faust vainly flies to the solitude of rocks and forests and strives to overcome temptation; he yields, and the old, old story is told again. The remainder of the drama is almost exactly followed in Gounod's opera, the girls at the fountain, Gretchen praying before the shrine of the Mater Dolorosa, Faust's encounter with the soldier-brother Valentine, whom he slays, and who dies cursing his lost sister; Margaret's agonised scene in the church, where the solemn sounds of the requiem mass combine with the whispered goadings of the evil spirit to drive her to utter despair; the scene on the Brocken, whither Mephisto takes Faust, in order to distract his thoughts and make him forget Gretchen. How he is only partially successful, and how on learning that Gretchen is in prison for causing the death of her mother by the sleeping-draught given that the lovers might meet undisturbed, Faust's better nature again asserts itself, and he insists on going to her aid; how the prison doors are opened and the guilty man vainly strives to undo his work in part, for the poor distraught girl is unable to recognise him, and dies in her misery—all this is a too familiar tale to every one. A few words on the later scenes are all that is here necessary. The Walpurgis Night scene, one of the later additions to the play, is long and, to the general reader, obscure. Various fantastic characters are introduced into it, and it ends with an Interlude, or play within a play, called "Walpurgis Night's Dream," or the "Golden Wedding of Oberon and Titania," which is simply a long series of four-line epigrams, spoken by numerous different phantoms, and which seem to serve no purpose but the doubtful one of taking one's thoughts away for a time from the main story. The prison scene, and consequently the whole drama, ends in a way which concludes nothing:—

Marg.—Father of heaven, have mercy on thy child!
Ye angels, holy hosts, keep watch around me.
Henry, I am afraid to look at thee. [She dies.]
Meph.—Come, she is judged! Is saved!
Voice (from above), Hither to me!
Meph. (to Faust), [Disappears with Faust.]
Voice (from within, dying away).—Henry! Henry!
The end.

One must not imagine that the Devil seizes upon Faust and takes him down below, but feeling that anything after the death of Margaret would be an anticlimax, the author simply abstains from continuing the story. Poets so rarely keep firm hold of an idea when they get one, and are so apt to let their thoughts wander off into other trains. How many of Byron's strongest poems fade off towards the end, or remain unfinished! Here Goethe has forgotten all about the compact between Faust and Mephistopheles, or has allowed the interest of the Gretchen episode to make him alter his first design. Of course after this a second part, embodying some kind of a conclusion, was a necessity, but circumstances conspired to delay it so long that it had better, perhaps, have been never written at all, at least as regards the unity of the work.

THE GREAT COMPOSERS

By JOSEPH BENNETT.

No. XVIII.—SCHUBERT.*

UNLESS the stranger in Vienna has some special reason, he is not likely to wander into the district called Lichtenthal. It is a common-place part of the city now, and must have been equally common-place ninety years back, although, at that time, one of the streets was called the "Gate of Heaven"—a fine name given, probably, by some authority with a sense of humour in his composition. It may be that the inhabitants, at some period or other since, resented the comparison thus invited. Anyhow, the street is now known as "Säulengasse," which architectural designation may or may not be deserved, but certainly makes pretensions more modest than the "Gate of Heaven." Within the ninety years, the houses in the street have been renumbered, and an enquiry into the antecedents of the present No. 54 shows that it was once No. 72. No. 54 is now—or was recently—a milk shop, under the sign of the "Red Crab." It has over the entrance door a marble tablet, whereon may be read the legend, "Franz Schuberts Geburtshaus" ("Franz Schubert's birthplace"). There is, also, the quite superfluous representation of a lyre, to indicate that Franz Schubert was musical, and a laurel wreath to declare that Vienna regards him as worthy of (post-mortem) honour. Should any one call for documentary proof that the "Red Crab" is really what its marble adornment pretends, such proof may be found (assuming that No. 54 was once No. 72) in the parish register, where the curious can read: "Franz Schubert, the lawfully begotten son of Franz Schubert, schoolmaster, and his wife, Elisabeth, both of the Catholic religion, was born at Himmelfortgrund, No. 72, and baptised as a Catholic in this church on February 1, 1797, by the Co-operator Johann Wanzka, in the presence of Herr Carl Schubert, acting as sponsor." Carl Schubert, it may be added, was the infant's uncle—elder brother of his father, and a respectable man who carried on a school in the Leopoldstadt.

So both father and uncle of the new-made Catholic were schoolmasters! The reason was that pedagogism ran in the family. Grandfather Schubert, it is true, escaped it. He was a "peasant cultivator" at Neudorf, in Moravia, and a person prominent enough among his fellows for the honour of some small magisterial position, equivalent, perhaps, to that held by the rural Maires of France. But if pedagogism skipped the Neudorf dignitary, it descended all the more heavily upon the next generation and the next. Carl, son of Grandfather Schubert, became a teacher in Vienna, as already stated, and to him, as assistant, went his brother Franz, who after two years' probation became parish schoolmaster in the Lichtenthal district; exercising his vocation, and also residing at the house No. 72, in Gate of Heaven Street.

Schoolmaster Franz had precocious tendencies in the direction of marriage. While yet his brother's helper, and not twenty years old, he fell in love with Elisabeth Fitz, a lady three years his senior, whose personal charms were supplemented by skill as a cook. Franz, we may well suppose, did not fare sumptuously every day in Carl's house, and it is easy to imagine that his beloved Elisabeth had for him incidental, though surreptitious, attractions of a gastronomic nature. Boys of nineteen sometimes possess wonderful appetites. But speculation apart, Franz and his cook consummated their happiness by matrimony, probably in 1783, and when the young husband removed to Gate of Heaven Street, an exceedingly good prospect of domestic provocation to industry helped him to settle down. His income was, of course, very small, but Providence has peculiar notions about the proportion of family to means. The proportion is often an inverse one, and inverse it was in the case of poor Franz. Elisabeth presented him with fourteen children, while, to make matters more incomprehensible, the pain and cost of bringing nine into the world went for nothing, owing to their speedy departure out of it. The five survivors were Ignaz, Ferdinand, Carl, Franz (our young Catholic of February 1, 1797), and Theresa. Of these, all the boys began life as schoolteachers, and the daughter married into the same profession, her husband, Mathias Schneider, becoming father of the Dr. Schneider, in whose famous cupboard Sir George Grove found the "Rosamunde" music. Let us add to these family details that, when Elisabeth Schubert died, in 1812, her husband speedily married again, and five other children came to augment alike his joys and sorrows.

Little Franz Schubert could not have had a very luxurious time during his childish days. There were too many in the family, and there was too little in the family purse for better than the hard life which respectable poverty entails. Happily, Providence had bestowed upon the child a gift which enabled him to create a world of his own—an enchanted world, where all was bright and lovely. He had in him the spirit of music, and circumstances, otherwise so forbidding, favoured its development. Music, like pedagogy, was a family appanage. The father played the violin, so did Ignaz and Ferdinand, the brothers. Ignaz could also play upon the pianoforte, and from him young Franz received his first lessons; the sire, meanwhile, teaching him the violin. But even before entering upon this course of home instruction, such as it was, the boy had found means to indulge his passion. While yet a mere tottler of five or six, he made close friends, as children sometimes will, with a joiner's apprentice—a namesake and a relative. Here was Franz's first hero—a big lad, no doubt, who could handle tools, who had a little money in his pocket sometimes, and knew, oh! so much about many things mysterious to the schoolmaster's little son. Best of all, the joiner's apprentice had the entrée of a piano factory, and often would take Franz with him on a visit to the place. Then the boy's soul, we may imagine, was "dissolved in ecstasy." At home there was only a poor old, cracked piano, that had long ago seen its best days, but the new ones in the factory were sonorous and eloquent enough to bring all heaven before the little boy's eyes. Upon them he practised his scales and exercises as best he could without a master, and when, having reached his seventh year, he passed under the regular tuition of his father and brother, there was general wonderment at what he knew and what he could do. In other matters he was quick to learn. His father tells us that, when at school in his sixth year, "he became distinguished invariably as the first of his competers." At the same time Franz loved healthful play. "From early childhood he delighted in companionship, and was never happier than when at play in a circle of merry schoolfellows." Here we have the picture of a perfectly natural boy, mentally older than his years, but with the spirit and instincts of a child.

Franz made wonderful progress in music and knew it. Indeed, it is easy to suppose that his not very skilful teachers were rather afraid of him. He must have been to them an enfant terrible, especially when he coolly dismissed his brother as no longer of any use. "I was amazed," says Ignaz, "when Franz told me, a few months after we began, that he had no need of any further instruction from me, and that, for the future, he would make his own way. And, in truth, his progress in a short period was so great that I was forced to acknowledge in him a master who had completely distanced and outstripped me, and whom I despaired of overtaking." We are not told whether Franz treated his father in the same fashion, but Franz père must have been blind if he did not see that here was a child for higher and better teaching than could be given at home. Many a time, we may suppose, did father, mother, and elder brothers discuss the wonderful boy, and what to do with him. At last they made up their minds, and Franz was taken to Michael Holzer, a choir-master in the Lichtenthal district, from him to receive lessons in thorough bass, and in playing the organ and pianoforte.

Worthy Master Holzer seems to have been one of the ordinary unaccented professors that swarm in German cities. Much learned perhaps, but little gifted, he was accustomed to plod along in musical ways, neither astonishing others nor being amazed himself. The new pupil from Gate of Heaven Street rather shook up the respectable choir-master, and opened his eyes to undreamed of prodigies. He, too, must have been half afraid of Franz, and a little abashed to boot. Plodding, matter-of-fact Holzer frankly tells us that he could not make his little scholar out. "If ever I wished to teach him anything new," says that excellent man, "I found he had already mastered it. Consequently, I cannot be said to have given him any lessons at all. I merely amused myself, and looked at my pupil with silent astonishment." Well he might, for young Franz had the power of anticipating the acquirement of knowledge by the exercise of an unerring instinct. He would extemporise on a theme in such a manner as to run beyond books he had never even begun, and Holzer, listening to him, would exclaim, "He has harmony at his fingers' ends!" Upon this Sir George Grove pertinently remarks: "Such astonishment was natural enough, but it would have been far better if he had taught him counterpoint." It appears, indeed, that the boy was "too clever by half," and his teachers sat in mute admiration of natural gifts which they should carefully have trained.

It would seem that young Franz practised composition even at this early period. According to his brother Ferdinand, his first work was a pianoforte piece for four hands, written in 1810, when Schubert was in his thirteenth year, but Kreissle von Hellborn speaks of songs and even string quartets bearing an earlier date. It is very easy to believe this. No doubt the boy began to write music as soon as he began to think it.

Schubert's fame as a "wonder-child" naturally spread through the Lichtenthal, and his fine treble voice made him a desirable youth in the eyes of choir-masters. So, at eleven years of age, he entered the choir of the parish church, as solo boy and violinist. Von Hellborn writes of surviving members of the congregation who recall the charm of his singing, "marked by correct and delicate expression." This, of course, was too good for the frequenters of a mere parish church and Franz Schubert père soon began to look higher for his hopeful son. "The Court Chapel is the place" thought the ambitious parent, and he at once enrolled young Franz among the candidates. There were a number of these, and on October 9, 1808, all had to appear for trial before an awful tribunal consisting of the two Imperial Kapellmeisters, Salieri and Eybler. For this momentous occasion Franz was dressed up in his best, though that was not much to boast of. He wore, we are told, an old blouse that, once blue, had washed nearly white; and the garment excited the ridicule of his fellow competitors. "Why, here's a miller's son!" exclaimed the Viennese youths, with the delicacy that distinguishes boys all the world over. There may have been, and probably was, something grotesque in the lad's appearance. His squat figure, round face, and rebellious hair were not prepossessing, nor, when he passed in to the examiners, can we suppose that he looked the conquering hero of the occasion. But as Franz opened his mouth things took another turn. The "miller's son" carried all before him. Difficulties were not such to him, and the sweet boyish voice pleaded eloquently in his favour. The examiners at once admitted him, and from that hour Schubert became a chorister of the Imperial Chapel, with the right to wear a resplendent uniform, and the privilege of board, lodging, and education in the choristers' school, known as the Convict.

Our young hero now entered upon a new phase of his career. He was separated from home and friends to a large extent, but against this could be set the fact that he lived in an atmosphere of music, which was to him the very breath of life. This became more and more evident as time went on. The education given in the Convict was general as well as special. Mathematics, geography, writing, French, Italian, and other branches of a "polite education" were taught by a staff of masters, who, for a while, had no trouble with their new pupil. But after a year, Franz fell hopelessly out of the race for the prize of general proficiency. Music claimed him more and more, and for his beloved art he neglected all things. Opportunities of indulging this passion were liberally afforded, especially through the medium of a small orchestra, composed of the boys and their teachers. In this Schubert played one of the first violins; sitting behind the leader—a big boy named Spaun, some seven years his senior. On the first occasion Spaun was astonished to hear an unusually excellent violin in rear, and, turning round, saw a small boy in spectacles named Franz Schubert. He at once took kindly to the small boy, and the two soon established relations of mutual confidence. The orchestra played the symphonies of the day with much assiduity, and young Schubert fed largely upon Haydn, Mozart, Krummer, Kozeluch, and others of more or less note. Sometimes, moreover, the earlier symphonies of Beethoven were tried, no doubt dubiously and as curiosities. These works, however, appealed more than all to the romanticism of Schubert's nature. He recognised them as kindred to himself, and, from that time, lowly worshipped at the shrine of the great master, whose companionship, though they were citizens of the same city, he unhappily never enjoyed. So ardently did our hero enter into this orchestral work, that he at length became leader and deputy conductor—a proud post which he would not have exchanged for the throne of the realm.

All this while the creative genius in Schubert was burning to exercise itself. The boy wrote incessantly, or, at any rate, whenever he could lay hands upon a scrap of music-paper. Want of paper seems to have been his chief difficulty. He had no money for its purchase, and the regulations of the Emperor's school were drawn up with such economy that it was not provided. In this strait, Schubert confessed to his friend Spaun the obstacle that lay in his path, whereupon the good-natured senior took care that a supply of paper was forthcoming. Sir George Grove gives some very interesting particulars of the works that now sprang from his teeming brain. They seem to have tumbled over each other in their hurry to issue forth, and to have been created with an impulse that never allowed reflection. We read of a Pianoforte Fantasia in a dozen movements, all of different character, and ending in a different key from that in which the work opens. Of another work—a song called "Hagar's Lament"—Kreissle von Helbbron says: "This lengthy and plaintive composition is extended over no less than twenty-eight pages, and is divided into several parts entirely distinct from one another in key and rhythm. It contains two short recitatives. This work certainly suffers from its fragmentary character; the vocal intervals are at times forced, the sequences harsh, and the pianoforte accompaniment here and there reminding the hearer of Zumsteg and Mozart. Still the work, viewed as a whole, has a value of its own, and never fails to make an impression when well executed by competent singers. There are some passages which breathe unmistakably the spirit of Schubert, and from these one catches, almost imperceptibly, the rustling of the wings of this genius." According to some authorities, it was this piece which specially attracted Salieri's attention and led him to arrange for Schubert's instruction in thorough-bass. Other works mentioned as belonging to this early period are a "Corpsé Fantasia"—a setting of some gloomy lines by Schiller, and a Christmas piece for voice and piano, pleasantly entitled "The Parricide."

It is clear from the foregoing particulars that Schubert wrote as one "possessed." The question with him was not so much of art as of utterance, and he disregarded the rules of the one in order to enjoy the full liberty of the other. Whatever came to his mind was flung on paper, and in all things he obeyed the dictates of his artistic impulse. Such a lad should have the bit in his mouth, and the reins in the hand of a firm and judicious guide. This, however, was never Schubert's position, for even when Salieri handed him over to Rucizka for thorough-bass lessons that professor did little save hold up amazed hands and exclaim, "He knows everything and God has been his teacher."

At a later period, Salieri himself took Schubert in hand, but master and pupil, though on excellent terms together, were not quite of one mind. The Italian musician desired to train Schubert as he himself had been brought up, whereas the young genius preferred German methods. Mozart and Haydn were his idols and he would sacrifice on no other altars. This ultimately led to a rupture between the two. According to Schubert's friend and boon companion, the breach took place because Salieri cut out or corrected all the passages in his pupil's Mass in B which reflected Haydn or Mozart. This is most probably the truth, but from the first the formal Italian and the impulsive young German were ill-assorted, and very little was required to break the connection. How closely Schubert clung to Mozart appears from an entry in his diary, where we read: "Gently, as if out of the distance, did the magic tones of Mozart strike my ears. With what inconceivable alternate force and tenderness did Schlesinger's masterly playing impress it deep, deep into my heart. Such lovely impressions remain on the soul, there to work for good, past all power of time or circumstances. In the darkness of this life they reveal a clear, bright, beautiful prospect, inspiring confidence and hope. O Mozart, immortal Mozart, what countless consolatory images of a bright better world hast thou stamped upon our souls!" Adoration such as this was not likely to cease at Salieri's command.

Meanwhile, Schubert went on composing as though for dear life. It would serve little purpose to give here a catalogue of his productions during the last three years at the Convict. Enough that they were many, and ranged over a wide extent of ground: from cantatas to songs, and from overtures to pianoforte pieces. He closed the list with a Symphony in D, played from MS. at the Crystal Palace in 1881, and since published by Breitkopf and Härtel. This was composed to celebrate the birthday of Dr. Innocenz Lang, director of the School, in whose honour the pupils performed it.

Schubert left the Convict, after five years' residence, at the end of October, 1813. He was then in his seventeenth year, and his boyish voice had broken. Yet he might have remained longer, and, it is said, that proposals were made to establish him on the foundation. But the youth longed for liberty, prompted thereto, perhaps, by a nature which was more jovial than circumspect. At any rate, he returned home, about the time when his father took a second wife.

That the Convict was not the best school for our young genius is perfectly clear. It did not subject him to the rigid course of training which his gifts required, nor does it seem to have exercised even a guiding influence. Schubert followed what was right in his own eyes, and hardened into practices the full disadvantage of which he saw and regretted in after life. In other respects the School had its drawbacks. Life there was very hard. A Spartan severity presided over the arrangements, even to the extent of denying growing lads enough to eat. We get a glimpse of this through a letter written by Schubert, in 1812, to his brother Ferdinand:—

"I've been thinking a good long time about my position, and find that it's very well on the whole, but that in some respects it can be improved. You know, from experience, that one can enjoy eating a roll and an apple or two, all the more when one must wait eight hours and a half after a poor dinner for a meagre supper. This wish has haunted me so often and so perseveringly that at last, volens volens, I must make a change. The few groschen my father gave me are all gone to the devil—what am I to do the rest of the time? 'They that hope in Thee shall not be ashamed' (Matt. ii. 4). So I thought. Supposing you advance me monthly a few kreutzen. You would never miss them, whilst I should shut myself up in my cell and be quite happy. As I said, I rely on the words of the Apostle Matthew, who says: 'Let him that hath two coats give one to the poor.' Meanwhile, I trust you will listen to the voice which unceasingly begs you to remember your loving, hoping, poverty-stricken—and once again I repeat poverty-stricken—brother,—FRANZ."

After hearing this cry of a hungry boy, we are not surprised that Schubert left the Convict as soon as he could, and went forth to liberty and enjoyment. Poor fellow, what remained for him was scarcely better than his past experience.

ORCHESTRAL MUSIC AND THE AMATEUR.

MANY of our readers have doubtless seen the correspondence between Mr. Manns and one of his subscribers upon the composition of the Crystal Palace programmes, and have enjoyed his masterly and overwhelming retort to the naïve protest that he exhibited an exclusive preference for German, and unmelodious German, music. The process of breaking a butterfly on the wheel could not have been more effectively performed. But we have waited in vain for some one to point out that in such a protest, irrelevant and injudicious as it appeared to be on the face of it, there is contained a certain substratum of truth, which it is difficult for cultivated musicians to realise unless they endeavour to place themselves on the platform and adopt the point of view of their less educated brethren. Their own training has begun so early, and thus enables them to take in the significance of a new composition with such readiness, that it is well-nigh impossible for them to understand the slower and more painful process by which the amateur mind works, and the imperative necessity of frequent hearings to enable it to fathom the true meaning of orchestral masterpieces, new and old. We would, therefore, advise good musicians not to indulge in mere scornful amazement at such a comparison as that instituted by the "Subscriber" between Raff's Symphony and the caterwauling of cats, but rather to recognise therein the not unnatural bewilderment of an untrained intelligence in the face of an elaborate manifestation of the resources of modern musical art—a bewilderment, however, which, given frequent opportunities of hearing the work, is not incompatible with subsequent appreciation culminating in enthusiastic admiration. The whole course of musical history teems with endless illustrations of the gradual growth of popularity in the case of acknowledged masterpieces. Critics of acknowledged eminence are sometimes candid enough to admit the various estimates induced in their own minds by successive hearings of works of note. In this connection we may quote the confession of M. de Saint-Saëns, who, in the introduction to his recently-published "Harmonie et Mélodie," remarks: "The first time that I heard Schumann's famous Quintet, I failed to recognise its high value to such an extent that it amazes me still when I think of it." And if this be the case with a trained intelligence, how much more complete must be the failure, and how much more gradual the development of appreciation in those who depend entirely upon public performances for their knowledge of orchestral music, and cannot supplement it by the previous study of a score or pianoforte arrangement? Under such circumstances, must not the impression left by a single hearing of any complicated orchestral work be somewhat bewildering? No one expects to fathom the depth of a play of Shakespeare's or any chef-d'œuvre of literature at a single perusal. Can we wonder if a Symphony by Raff or Brahms or Dvorák on a first hearing creates but a faint, unsatisfactory, or even disagreeable impression on the average musical intelligence? For it should be borne in mind that conscious incapacity to understand a thing often begets dislike towards it. And then music is at this great disadvantage, as compared with literature, in that everybody can read a play of Shakespeare as often as he likes, but only a privileged few can read a musical score, and the great majority come away from the performance of a new Symphony with the sense of confusion or dislike that we have described impressed upon their minds, until the next opportunity of hearing the work in question serves to clear away the clouds a little bit, and abate their ignorance and prejudice. Whether this difficulty is one which admits of any remedy or solution is a question on which we propose to offer a few remarks presently, but in the meantime we trust that our indication of its existence will not be met with the rejoinder that those persons in whom it is encountered are unworthy of the consideration of true musicians. This uncon-promising attitude, we know, is maintained by some thoroughgoing enthusiasts; but, practically, can musicians afford to absolutely ignore persons like the "Subscriber"? In the millennium perhaps, but not before. They still compose a large proportion of the concert-going public, and, so far as it is compatible with the true interests of art, they should be dealt with tenderly. We are not arguing, be it remembered, for the smallest lowering of the artistic level of works performed, but only for an extension of opportunities. For in these purblind intelligences, as they appear to be, there exists, often unknown to themselves, a latent possibility of intense appreciation for the highest outcomes of the art. Their taste is often excellent, so far as it goes, and they have a strong desire, in many cases, to extend the sphere of their appreciation. We have it on the best authority that a high official at the Crystal Palace, who began by execrating and abominating the "Tannhäuser" overture, ended, after repeated hearings, by preferring it to any other piece in Mr. Manns's répertoire. The writer of this article owes the most valuable part of a very irregular and imperfect education in music to his attendance at orchestral rehearsals, in other words, to the facilities afforded him of hearing pieces as often as possible. A famous German conductor some few years back, dissatisfied with the impression created by a performance of the Choral Symphony, repeated it on the spot, and this somewhat arbitrary procedure was amply justified by the redoubled plaudits of his audience. Herr Richter, wise in his generation, evidently sets great store by the principle of repetition so far as English audiences are concerned, and his reluctance to extend his répertoire is probably due to the fact that his most often repeated pieces are undoubtedly the most popular. The orchestral arrangement of "Tristan und Isolde" was never more enthusiastically received than at its most recent performance in St. James's Hall. Indeed, the old proverb needs recasting. Familiarity breeds not contempt, but understanding and admiration in the mind of the average concert-goer. With the chosen few, the critic and the enlightened connoisseur, the case is entirely different. Mr. Manns is indefatigable in his efforts to provide novelty and variety for their jaded palates, but unless any work of first-rate importance is to be produced, there is a sad emptiness in the benches of a certain classical section of the gallery of the Crystal Palace Concert-room. After making due allowance for inclement weather, distance, and concurrent engagements, we are yet driven to believe that the Crystal Palace programmes overshoot the capacity of the "Subscriber" by just as much as they fall short of the demands of the critic and connoisseur. For our own part, we have no desire to see any further concessions made to insatiate hankers after novelty. We are rather concerned with the attempt to discover a method of relieving that sense of helplessness which so often assails the ordinary amateur when confronted for the first time by symphonic music. In such cases, as we have already pointed out, their only chance of attaining to ultimate comprehension consists in hearing the work as often as possible. If they really have the wish to appreciate, they will avail themselves of such opportunities as already exist. The orchestral performances, which take place three times a week at the Crystal Palace, and at each of which a Symphony is generally given, afford just such a training as would have prevented the "Subscriber" from uttering her unlucky complaint. But in the case of absolute novelties, which are often given but once, no such remedy exists, unless the public were admitted at a reduced fee to rehearsals, a course which has much to recommend it, in spite of obvious disadvantages. It has often occurred to us that the publication and circulation of analytical programmes some little time previous to the performance would be an additional aid in a small way to the general public. For, as the musical critic of the Athenæum, in its issue of the 12th ult., justly remarks, analytical programmes are not primarily intended for musicians in the strict sense of the word, but for amateurs; and, let us add, such programmes are now-a-days so complete and long that unfortunate amateurs may often be seen, with eyes glued to the book, struggling to keep pace with the orchestra, and deriving more bewilderment than enlightenment from the comments and musical illustrations of the analyst.

THE Committee of the Leeds Musical Festival met the other day to receive a report of progress from their able and energetic honorary secretary, Mr. Alderman F. Spark. They must have been satisfied, we fancy. Mr. Spark had nothing but good news, alike as to business and art. The guarantee fund has reached a total of £19,000, or thereabouts—"sinews of war," indeed!—to say nothing of the reserve fund, now considerably exceeding £1,000. This is excellent, and we are glad to note that the reserve fund is likely to receive a substantial addition next autumn. The more the better, because it gives confidence and warrants adventure. The Committee desire, of course, to avoid the necessity of calling upon the guarantors, and having a good round sum at their banker's, they can do this without in any way checking the spirit of enterprise. In the matter of new works Mr. Spark had to tell of completed negotiations with two native composers (Sir Arthur Sullivan and Mr. Mackenzie) and one foreigner (Antonín Dvořák). The gifted Bohemian master will prepare an Oratorio on the subject of one of his national saints, and already interested expectation is felt in musical circles about a work which cannot but be peculiarly acceptable to oratorio-loving England. Sir Arthur Sullivan has promised a Cantata on the lines of his "Martyr of Antioch," and Mr. Mackenzie a secular Cantata, the libretto of which has been written by his co-labourer on "The Rose of Sharon"—Mr. Joseph Bennett. In "The Story of Sayid" Mr. Bennett has followed pretty closely the "argument" of a short poem in Mr. Edwin Arnold's "Pearls of the Faith," Mr. Arnold having not only given a kind permission, but sanctioned the use of any extracts likely to prove useful. The book is full of dramatic and picturesque incident. With these three new compositions, the Festival will have enough of novelty, and time to spare for standard works, which ought on no account to be neglected. The dates of the Festival are fixed for October 13, 14, 15, and 16 next.

THE sittings of the Viennese Conference have resulted in the adoption of the French pitch, and, considering the collapse of the movement in England, it is not to be wondered at that our press should have contented itself with a bare announcement of the fact. Indeed, there was justice in the satisfaction expressed by one of our contemporaries that no English representative was sent, for, as it was remarked, where would have been the use in the absence of any effective means of enforcing the decision of the Conference in this country? Mr. Grønings has called our attention to a third letter of his to the Era, in which the relief which a lowered pitch would bring to the players of the E flat soprano cornet in our brass bands is clearly and forcibly demonstrated. Now, as the writer goes on to point out, brass bands are a most important factor in the musical education of the masses. "Most school children are now taught the rudiments of music, and learn songs suitable for their age. So far so good; but what after they leave school? Perhaps not ten per cent. can afford to attend concerts. For further cultivation of musical taste (or the reverse) and for musical enjoyment (or annoyance) at least ninety per cent. are for the rest of their lives thrown principally on street-music and on open-air music. . . . Our singers and orchestras may perform to thousands, and our military bands to tens of thousands; whereas our brass bands reach constantly the ears of hundreds of thousands. Decent and adequate performances of adaptations of good musical works foster the desire with many to come indoors and hear the original setting, and thereby act gratuitously, and on a large scale, as outdoor heralds to the real shows. Any assistance rendered them by the musical profession would, therefore, soon bring its own reward in a material shape. The first (and a very important) step towards helping them would be to ease the task of those thousands of performers on the most trying instrument (i.e., the soprano cornet) by bringing about a reasonably lowered standard pitch." We have quoted the foregoing remarks more for their judicious tone in regard to the great question of the popularisation of good music and the resources available to that end, than for their bearing on the pitch controversy, which even the letters of Mr. Grønings have been unable to galvanise into life.

OUR debt to the East in respect of design and colour has been so great of late years as to have given quite a fresh impulse to decorative art in all its branches. Under these circumstances, and employing the argument from analogy, is it not rather a bold thing to imply that the lack of appreciation we evince for Oriental music is due to our ignorance rather than its intrinsic demerit? For this we take to be the point made by the writer of an interesting "turnover" article on this subject in the Globe, of November 26. Is it not more probable, in view of the rage for Oriental art, that efforts would have been made by æsthetic enthusiasts to cultivate a passion for eastern music, if they saw any grounds, however small, for a hope of succeeding in their task? Rather are we inclined to side with a modern musical critic of eminence—M. de Saint-Saëns—who, in his recently published volume, classes the Orientals along with the ancients and the negroes of Africa as unable, by their inferior organisation, to raise themselves to the conception of harmony. He adds, "The Orientals have pushed their studies in the domain of melody and rhythm very far indeed, but harmony is unknown to them." Composers, from Mozart downwards, have not hesitated to avail themselves of such resources where they thought it desirable to infuse a local colouring into their compositions, but a wholesale appreciation of Oriental music could only be affected by [the annihilation of the civilisation of the West.

WHEN we read that on the appearance of Madame Minnie Hauk, at New York, in the character of Carmen, she positively refused to take the slightest notice of the bouquets which, according to custom, were showered upon the stage, we began to think that prime donne were gradually discovering that in gratifying their vanity they are degrading the art of which they profess to be representatives. That Madame Hauk's example of self-denial, however, is a solitary one seems to be indicated by the fact of Madame Nevada adopting the absurd system of changing her dress after every song at the Concerts she is now giving in America. On one occasion we are informed that she first appeared in a costume of pale blue silk, tastefully embroidered with daisies; afterwards she came forward in a red velvet bodice and overskirt which "told with effect against the under-skirt of white satin, bearing, like the bodice, large rose-coloured flowers embroidered in high relief." Then came the wedding dress (of which we have heard so much) that she wore at her marriage in the French capital, a costume almost defying description, but sufficiently distracting in its effect upon the audience to make it doubtful whether the applause which was showered upon her was elicited by her singing or her dress. Should this custom grow, composers will have a hard task before them in battling successfully with the dressmaker. A charming vocal solo may be positively killed by a more charming costume, and even artistic defects may be covered by the skill of the modiste. Worse than this, when we are told that a public singer has no "style," we must be careful to know whether this criticism comes from the musical critic or the costumier.

MR. A. C. MACKENZIE IN SCOTLAND.

THE progress which is being made in music in Scotland has been exhibited in a remarkable degree, as well by the enthusiastic reception accorded to Mr. A. C. Mackenzie, as by the performances of the great works which have been recently given under the auspices of the larger choral societies in such important centres as Edinburgh, Glasgow, Dundee, and Stirling. At the latter place, Gounod's "Mors et Vita" was presented for the first time in English. At the other towns named, Mackenzie's "Rose of Sharon" has been performed, under the personal direction of the author. The occasion of his return to his native land, with the cachet of approval from England and several foreign countries, has inspired the kindly Scottish people with a belief in the reality of their almost unique possession—a Scottish composer.

It is somewhat remarkable, that while Scotland can show a long line of illustrious names in every department of art, literature, science, mechanics, and philosophy, the number of composers of music has been very few. There have been song-writers, it is true, since the days of David Rizzio, but their efforts have not commanded all the admiration they deserve for any wide distance beyond the immediate field of their operations. It may therefore be asserted, with some degree of unstretched truth, that Alexander Campbell Mackenzie is the first distinguished composer Scotland has had, and that the enthusiastic welcome given to him on his return to his native land proves the readiness of musicians and compatriots to accept him according to his merits. Certain of his orchestral and vocal pieces have already found their way into programmes of music in Scotland, thanks to the untiring efforts of Mr. August Manns in the cause of native art. There was, therefore, an almost eager desire to hear a great vocal work from his pen, more especially as his countrymen, with native peculiarity, preferred to test for themselves the value of the encomiums which had been evoked by the performances "down South," before they lifted their "approving voices."

The first representation of the "Rose of Sharon" was given at the opening Concert of the season by the Glasgow Choral Union, a body whose labours in the cause of music in the West of Scotland have been productive of the most gratifying results. Madame Albani, Miss Hilda Wilson, Mr. Edward Lloyd, and Mr. Watkin Mills were the chief vocalists, and it may be almost unnecessary to say that in their competent hands the work was done not only accurately, but also conscientiously and artistically. The chorus singing was especially good, and reflected the highest credit upon Mr. Allan Macbeth, who had been at the trouble of making the most careful preparation. The first performance on Tuesday, the 8th ult., was excellent, but the singers were not encouraged in their efforts by the warm applause of the audience. There was no lack of appreciation, however, and every one present remained until the conclusion of the performance. On the following Saturday, when the work was repeated at popular prices, and with the assistance of Mrs. Hutchinson instead of Madame Albani, there were over 3,000 persons in the audience, many of whom had been present at the first representation, but the majority heard it for the first time. The enthusiastic reception of the work on this occasion was beyond all description; the composer was recalled after each part, with cheers that must have made his heart leap with delight. The performers, feeling that they were before an audience who were in the most sympathetic agreement with their efforts, were moved to exertions which had the best results. The chorus singing especially was particularly fine, and those who had heard disparaging remarks from time to time concerning the character of Scottish chorus singing in general, and of the labours of the Glasgow Choral Union in particular, had then and there the opportunity of judging for themselves. The effect produced resulted in a most agreeable disappointment. Glasgow may well be proud of such a choir, as they have reason to congratulate themselves upon their trainer, Mr. Allan Macbeth.

In the interval of time between the two performances in Glasgow, the Oratorio had been given in Edinburgh and in Dundee, the first with Madame Albani, the second with Mrs. Hutchinson and the other vocalists. In Dundee the reception accorded to the work and to the composer was most enthusiastic, and in Edinburgh the return of the composer to his native city, crowned with the laurels of his English triumphs, was signalled by a fine performance of the work, for which the chorus had been trained by Mr. Collinson. The band was the same in each place.

It is not, however, necessary to speak of the work in detail, inasmuch as it has already become familiar in London, and has taken a distinct place among the important art creations of its kind all over the country. The work which the composer had done before had been the means of calling the attention of all interested in the progress of art to the great ability he possessed, and when finally his own countrymen were determined to do him honour and to give him the enthusiastic reception which was his due, they not only honoured him, but conferred a recognition of art which all Scottish musicians may share. Besides then making careful preparations to render his work in a worthy manner in the chief musical centres of Scotland, the musicians of the several places gathered together to offer him both hospitality and their expressions of admiration and encouragement upon an occasion almost, if not absolutely, unique in the history of music in the North. Scotland possesses now a composer who owes his birth and infant nurture to her soil, a composer of its own nationality, who may become the national composer, if the country is as true to its musical children as it has always been to her sons in other walks of art, science, and mental culture. There is little fear that she will be wanting in her duty in this respect if the tone of the remarks made by Dr. Pryde, who presided at the banquet given in honour of Mr. Mackenzie at Edinburgh, represents the feeling of the nation in the matter. In proposing "Long life, success, and continued fame to Mr. A. C. Mackenzie," he said:—

"In spite of his hereditary advantages, Mr. Mackenzie, like every good and true man, had his own battle to fight, and his own difficulties to surmount, at the commencement of his career; but, notwithstanding all these, the divine spark within him would not be quenched. The soul of music within his breast behaved to find expression. Accordingly, every spare hour was devoted to his beloved study, and he became master of all the resources of his art, so that when the proper time and the proper opportunity arrived, he produced a masterpiece which at once challenged the admiration of the public. Like Lord Byron, he awoke one morning and found himself famous; and since that time there was scarcely a species of musical composition which he had not tried and in which he had not made a great hit. In cantata, in opera, in oratorio, in concerto for the violin, he had more than realised the expectations of the public; and at the present time the best critics of music were his warmest admirers."

To this Mr. Mackenzie, rising amid enthusiastic applause to reply, said:—"It was one thing to listen to the applause of a satisfied public, and quite another thing to receive the cordial greeting of an assembly of friends like the present; and within an hour, he might say, he had had the pleasurable experience of both of these. At that moment it was most difficult for him to give expression to his feelings, but he hoped they would forgive him if he did not succeed in conveying to those present as clearly as he would wish all that was passing through his mind." He must not forget to whom he was mainly indebted, not only for the musical and artistic success of that evening, but for the pleasure of meeting his old friends. It was to the Choral Unions of Glasgow and Edinburgh that he was so indebted; and it was an event in the career of any composer, however ambitious, to have four performances of his work, with perhaps the finest vocal quartet in Europe. He would take that opportunity of thanking those Choral Unions for having placed all this in his power. He did, after the lapse of these years, expect to find improvement in those societies, but he had been astonished at the refinement and enthusiasm which were so long wanting. For all this improvement they had to thank the gentlemen who had been preparing the works. Nothing could have been better than the way in which Mr. Collinson, conductor of the Edinburgh Choral Union, had drilled his forces, and he had the same to say about Glasgow in regard of a townsman of their own, Mr. Macbeth. The memory of this evening," Mr. Mackenzie added, "would certainly not fade away. They had given him the greatest encouragement; and he should, in any future work, strive to show that they had not repaid their confidence in him in vain."

Mr. James G. Syme, who was the Vice-Chairman, also made some happy references to the occasion of their meeting together; and Mr. W. A. Barrett, who was on a professional visit to Edinburgh, in replying to the toast of "Music," said, among other things, "it was a great pleasure to him, as an individual musician, to find so much good feeling and so much enthusiasm in the cause of music in a country that had for so long a time been looked upon as almost barren of musical results. But in the South they looked upon Glasgow and Edinburgh now as the great centres of music in Scotland, and it was a great pleasure to him, and to all who were interested in the cause of art, to find that they had now their own national composer—a composer whose genius and talents had received the cordial recognition of other countries besides his own."

On the following Friday evening, Mr. Mackenzie was entertained at a banquet in St. Andrew's Hall, by the Glasgow Society of Musicians, and was made an honorary member of the Society. There was a numerous company. Mr. Julius Seligmann, president of the Society, occupied the chair, and among the other gentlemen present were Sir William Thomson, Dr. Hueffer, Dr. Peace, Rev. Dr. Corbett, Professor Simpson, Messrs Barrett (London), Allan Macbeth, Alfred Littleton, of Messrs Novello, Ewer and Co.; John Wallace, J. T. Fyfe, Berger, Sellars, and Myles. The Chairman, in proposing the toast of the evening and in welcoming Mr. Mackenzie as an honorary member of the Society, remarked that it was only comparatively recently that Scotchmen had begun to see that they had not made sufficient progress in music. Formerly there were not many good teachers in Scotland, and Scotchmen did not go abroad for the purpose of learning. With increased means of communication, and a generally higher culture, another state of matters was introduced. A better class of teachers came from abroad, and Scotch musicians travelled to London and the Continent, and returned laden with experience and new ideas, and they made the best of them. Among those who had done so, none had taken a higher place than the Scotchman, in whose honour they were met that evening. He said, without the slightest fear of contradiction, that Mr. Mackenzie was Scotland's greatest musician, and he was acknowledged to be one of the best of the young living composers. The Society had much pleasure in welcoming Mr. Mackenzie as an honorary member, and as a guest whom they wished to honour, and they desired to assure him of their respect, esteem, and appreciation, and to wish him long life, health and wealth, prosperity and happiness, and their good wishes would accompany him wherever he went. Mr. Mackenzie, who was received with prolonged cheering, said he had been deeply touched by the kindness which had prompted his brother artists in the principal cities of the country to extend to him an outstretched hand. It was to the Choral Unions of Glasgow, Edinburgh, and Dundee, that he owed his visit to Scotland for the first time in a professional capacity. It was to the Choral Unions in Scotland that the immense advance that had been made in the knowledge of music was due. It was in Glasgow that he first conducted, and, indeed, first heard an orchestral score. He had been struck by the improvement that he found everywhere in choral singing; especially did he find that the apathy and indolence which used to be prominent had almost entirely disappeared. They must not forget to give honour to those who had brought this about, namely—the Choral Unions, and the gentlemen who trained them; and he wished to express his indebtedness to Mr. Macbeth for the trouble he had taken in this direction. Although he dared not hope to justify all that had been said of him, he should endeavour to do so. He was certain that he would not fail from laziness or from want of energy, and he would be quite happy to fall when he received the blow from a better and stronger man. In conclusion, Mr. Mackenzie urged that something might be done towards forming a society for the encouragement of young musicians by offering scholarships and giving prizes for the smaller kinds of compositions.

Messrs. Hueffer and W. A. Barrett replied to the toast of the "Guests," and the close of the evening was distinguished by a performance of vocal and instrumental music, including many of the compositions of Mr. Mackenzie. The whole course of events has not only been remarkable in itself, but is particularly noteworthy as a page of the history of music in Scotland.

Apud the visit of Mr. Mackenzie to Scotland, the following letters, which have appeared in several Glasgow papers, will be read with interest:—

"58, West Regent Street, Glasgow,
"December 16, 1885.

"Sir,—Herewith I send you copies of letters received by our president, Mr. Andrew Myles, from Mr. A. C. Mackenzie, the composer, and Mr. W. A. Barrett, Mus. Bac. (Oxon.), H.M. Inspector of Music in Schools, and Vicar Choral of St. Paul's, London, and will feel obliged by your kindly inserting same in to-morrow's paper.

"I am, &c.,

"JOHN WALLACE, Acting Secretary."

"London, December 15, 1885."

"Dear Mr. Myles,—Let me request you to convey my thanks to the active members of the Glasgow Choral Union for the care and attention which they devoted to the preparation and performance of the 'Rose.' Particularly on the evening of Saturday, the 12th, was I gratified and pleased with the rendering of the choral portions of my work, and I have never conducted it with greater pleasure. It was on that occasion abundantly proved to me that the choristers have an earnest desire to do their very best, also that there is certainly no lack of that rare commodity, enthusiasm, and a conductor should consider himself fortunate to meet with the decided, ready, and willing response which was accorded to my beat on the evening in question. Since I am fully aware that the desire for improvement exists strongly in your Union, I need not point out the necessity for continued, careful, and constant practice, attention to the finer lights and shades, &c., all that is in the hands of their own talented conductor. The choir possesses the qualifications which must lead to successful public renderings of any work it may choose to study; and once more expressing entire satisfaction with the choral efforts of the past week,

"Believe me, dear Sir, very faithfully yours,

"A. C. MACKENZIE.

"Andrew Myles, Esq., President of the Glasgow Choral Union."

"Glasgow, December 12, 1885.

"My Dear Mr. Myles,—I should like to be permitted to offer, through you, my best thanks to your committee for the opportunity given to me to hear the two performances of Mr. Mackenzie's Oratorio 'The Rose of Sharon,' by the Glasgow Choral Union. I have heard many performances of the work since it was produced at Norwich, and I am bound to say that few were equal in excellence and all-round earnestness to those given by the Choral Union on Tuesday and Saturday last. The efforts of the principal vocalists and of the band deserve all praise for their splendid co-operation; but the chorus, which is the stationary portion of the whole musical body, and to a certain extent the Choral Union proper, may, in my opinion, be singled out for especial commendation. There are some excellent singers in the choir, and they have evidently given great attention to the instructions of their competent and artistic trainer, Mr. Allan Macbeth. They exhibited an amount of enthusiasm and attention which must have been prompted by the greatest interest in their labours and confidence in their guide. It was probably this spirit which sustained them throughout the performance on Tuesday before an appreciative though undemonstrative audience. On Saturday, when the sympathies of the hearers with the performers were unmistakably shown by the warmest applause, the whole body of musicians employed in interpreting the work—conductor, principals, organist, band, and chorus—were inspired to exertions which displayed their qualifications in the most satisfactory form. The result proved, to my mind at least, that you have every reason to be proud of the united body forming the Union, and especially of your chorus. I am sure that Mr. Mackenzie must have been gratified by the issue, and I hope that the encouragement thus given to him as a national composer may inspire both him and others to pursue the path now so brilliantly opened. I trust that I may have the privilege of noting the progress you may make in time to come on the occasion of any subsequent visit to Glasgow which I may make when the Choral Union is at work. Wishing you all the success you desire and deserve,—Believe me, yours very truly,

"WM. ALEX. BARRETT."

ROYAL ALBERT HALL CHORAL SOCIETY.

SINCE the opening of the season with Gounod's "Mors et Vita," only familiar works have been performed by this Society, and it is therefore merely necessary to refer briefly to what has been done. To make the record complete we must go back to the performance of "Elijah," on November 25. Not even at the great provincial festivals are the choruses in Mendelssohn's Oratorio heard to such advantage as in the Albert Hall by Mr. Barnby's splendidly trained force, and in saying that the present rendering was equal to the average, we imply that it was little short of perfection. Unqualified terms of praise may also be employed respecting the soloists. Seldom of late has Mr. Santley been in such fine voice, and thus the title part was interpreted in a manner impossible to surpass. Madame Albani in the soprano solos, and Mr. Maas in those for tenor, were of course everything that could be desired, and Miss Hilda Wilson strengthened her reputation by her artistic and impressive delivery of "O rest in the Lord."

Handel's martial Oratorio "Judas Maccabæus" was given on the 9th ult., the usual orchestra being supplemented by a military band. Musicians will regret that Mr. Barnby should deem it advisable to make such a concession to the tastes of the vulgar, for though the effectiveness of the added brass and percussion in certain numbers may be conceded, the thing is wrong in principle, and should be discouraged. In every other respect the performance was thoroughly satisfactory. The choruses were sung with immense spirit, and due justice was rendered to the solos by Miss Anna Williams, Miss Eleanor Farnol, Miss Hope Glenn, Mr. Joseph Maas, Mr. Arthur Thompson, and Signor Foli.

NOVELLO'S ORATORIO CONCERTS.

THE high opinion on the merits of the choir assembled under the bâton of Mr. Mackenzie, which we expressed at the first Oratorio Concert, was more than confirmed by the performance of Gounod's "Mors et Vita," given at the second Concert, on the 1st ult. It is rarely indeed that we listen to choral music rendered with such faultless precision, such perfect balance of tone, and such true perception of the composer's meaning; and, considering the limited time which was occupied in the preparation of the work, we cannot but marvel how these effects were realised. We may even go so far as to say that many beauties which depended for due appreciation upon the utmost clearness of enunciation in all the parts were more accurately defined than at the performance at the Birmingham Festival. Not only were the elaborate contrapuntal passages sung with that decision which places the hearer in true sympathy with the music, but the attacks were given with thrilling effect, and where the solemnity of the text called for a subdued and reverential tone in the choir, the demand was responded to with a success which produced a powerful impression upon the auditors. It is unnecessary again to enlarge upon the exquisite manner in which Madame Albani sang the soprano solos. Madame Trebelli, like a true artist, threw her whole heart into the music assigned to her, and received warm and well merited applause. Messrs. Lloyd and Santley—who, with Madame Albani, were the original singers at Birmingham—repeated with their usual success their inimitable rendering of the tenor and bass solos. Mr. Mackenzie's thorough command of band and chorus was the theme of admiration throughout the evening. Cool and collected at all times, he has the power of infusing his spirit into the body of executants under his direction with a result which has already placed him in the foremost rank of Conductors; and his popularity was fully attested by the spontaneous plaudits of an overwhelming audience, both after the first part, and at the conclusion of the performance. The orchestral portions were played throughout with a refined appreciation of the beauty of the music; and Mr. Oliver King presided with the utmost skill and judgment at the organ. The demands for tickets were so numerous that hundreds had to be refused admission; and there can be little doubt that this earnest desire to hear Gounod's latest great work will be materially deepened by a performance so absolutely perfect in all its details.

The third performance of the season took place in St. James's Hall on the 22nd ult., and was attended by a large and distinguished audience. Gounod's "Redemption" supplied the theme—one of which our public seems never to tire. But if the French master's work draws crowds without regard to time and season, it should surely do so when the great Christian festivals are near at hand, and men's thoughts turn more than usual to the history of the Redeemer. Its effect at the Christmas performance, therefore, was asserted to the consciousness of many present with added force. We are not called upon to discuss the "Redemption." That has been done sufficiently, and the Trilogy has passed beyond argument to the place which public feeling decreed for it. What place that is everybody knows, and even critics who think it undeserved have perforce to acquiesce in a judgment they cannot reverse.

The performance, taken as a whole, was excellent, and conducted with singular good judgment and skill by Mr. Mackenzie. Obviously the Scottish composer exercises an independent opinion in his place as Conductor, and there were points of difference from rule in his reading of the "Redemption," which may be put to his credit as distinct advantages. Moreover he sought to endow the work of the chorus with greater vitality by giving it expression. As a rule the Oratorio chorus is very much like that of Italian Opera. It simply sings and gives no sign of feeling or of appreciation of the fact that it is taking part in a drama. We noticed some improvement upon this under Mr. Mackenzie, indications being given now and again of a desire to obtain declamatory force. This was well, and much more might be done in the same direction. The soloists were Madame Albani, Miss Hilda Coward, Madame Trebelli, Mr. Maas, Mr. Bridson (in place of Mr. Ludwig), and Mr. Santley. Concerning some of these it is superfluous to say more than that they repeated a familiar success. We refer especially to Madame Albani and Mr. Santley, the original interpreters of their respective parts. Madame Albani, it may be added, gave the solo in "From His love as a Father" with intense earnestness, and made a great sensation. Madame Trebelli, efficient as usual, offered no fault to the shafts of criticism, and Mr. Maas, on his part, showed how intelligently he had prepared his difficult task as tenor narrator. He delivered the text without exaggeration yet with deep feeling. Mr. Bridson justified his choice as an artist capable of doing things well at short notice, and thus the ensemble was complete.

CRYSTAL PALACE.

For conscientious adherence to the composer's minute directions, as well as for fine quality of tone and general finish of execution, no finer performance of the "Symphonie Fantastique" has been given in England than that conducted by Mr. Manns on November 28. The beautiful second movement, which affords signal proof of the success with which a waltz measure can be treated symphonically, was especially enjoyable, and full justice was done to the melancholy grace of the Scène aux champs (Adagio). The revival of one of Handel's six "Concerti per l'organo ed altri stromenti" was fully justified by the intrinsic interest of the work, as well as by the evident appreciation of the audience. The solo part, given to the harp on this occasion, and judiciously expanded in places by the substitution of chords for single notes, was admirably played by Mr. Lockwood, who contrived to throw a great deal of expression into his rendering, while the accompaniment, for muted violins and basses pizzicato, was given with admirable restraint and purity of tone. The singer was Miss Amy Sherwin, who was heard to advantage in Félicien David's graceful romance, "Charmant oiseau" ("La Perle du Brésil"), an aria di agilità, which is marked by the two qualities, which a recent critic justly ascribes to David—naïveté and colour. Miss Sherwin's rendering of Schubert's "Du bist die Ruh" was more noticeable for refinement than perfect intonation, but was received with favour. The Concert opened with a finished performance of the "Athalie" Overture, in which the strings were especially distinguished, and was concluded by the "Tannhäuser" Overture.

The 5th ult., being the date of Mozart's death, the first part of the eighth Concert was entirely devoted to works by that composer. The performance of the "Jupiter" Symphony, which opened the Concert, calls for no criticism except the remark that by some oversight the violins were not muted in the Andante. The Adagio from the Clarinet Concerto served to display that perfect command over his instrument, combined with good taste, which invariably characterise Mr. Clinton's performances. The rendering given by Madame Frickenhaus of the solo part in the "Coronation" Concerto, if slightly wanting in power, was at least laudably free from eccentricity, and marked by refinement and sound method. In agreeable contrast with the orchestral music already mentioned was the performance by Mr. Santley of "Deh vieni alla finestra" ("Don Giovanni") delightfully accompanied by the orchestra, and "Fin ch' han dal vino" from the same work. Dvorák's Notturmo, for strings only, is one of the least original works of that most original writer, and failed to create a marked impression, though finely played, while the absence of distinction in the melodies of Tschaiowsky's Capriccio Italien is not compensated for by their clever orchestration. Of the various sections of this work the opening Andante is much the most attractive. Mr. Santley contributed Sir Arthur Sullivan's very Gounodesque "Thou'rt passing hence, my brother!" with great feeling, and the programme ended with Mr. F. H. Cowen's cleverly scored suite de ballet "The language of the flowers."

A first appearance of more than usual importance was made on the 12th ult., by M. Stanislaus Bercewicz, whose choice of the second Concerto of his compatriot Wieniawski—that dedicated to Señor Sarasate—was excellently suited for the display of his abilities as an executant. Let us say at once that the difficulties with which it bristles could not have been surmounted more triumphantly by the Spanish virtuoso himself. M. Bercewicz's intonation is very good and his tone agreeable, though inclined at times to be nasal in his lower notes, and the effect of his performance may be measured by the fact that some of the audience, with injudicious enthusiasm, broke out into applause in the middle of one of the movements of the Concerto. His playing of a Moto perpetuo, by Franz Ries, was an amazing display of clean execution and perfect intonation, and provoked an irresistible encore. It remains to be seen whether the remarkably favourable impression created by M. Bercewicz in these tours de force will be confirmed by his performance of those compositions which make a larger demand upon the intelligence and sentiment than the executive faculties. The great pace at which the second part of the first movement of Schumann's Symphony (No. 1, in B flat) was taken, seemed rather to blur its outlines, but the performance of the remaining sections was masterly, and it would be unjust not to mention the fine playing of the first horn and flute in the Finale. In the greatest of overtures ("Leonora," No. 3) the orchestra was heard at its very best: indeed, we doubt if Mr. Manns has ever directed a more splendid performance. Here, if ever, was an opportunity for a demonstration, but the audience, presumably, had exhausted their powers of applauding, and would have deemed it an ineptitude to exhibit enthusiasm towards the last piece on the programme. Other orchestral numbers were Sir G. Macfarren's scholarly Overture to his "St. John the Baptist," and a prettily scored but thin Scherzo by Goldmark. The vocalist was Madame Biro de Marion, whose chief contribution was Beethoven's great Scena "Ah perfido." This lady's method is good, but her voice, though of considerable volume and compass, is sadly wanting in freshness, and her choice of "La Calandrina," a florid Air by Jomelli, most unfortunate. Such a song, ranging to the highest register of the soprano voice, is only tolerable if sung to absolute perfection. Short of that—and we are obliged to say that Madame de Marion came a good deal short—such efforts are only productive of pain and pity in the auditor.

Before what must be considered a good house for the Crystal Palace, Mr. Cowen's "Sleeping Beauty" was brought for the first time to the hearing of a Metropolitan audience on the 19th ult. The habitudes of these Concerts are not particularly demonstrative, but there was no mistaking the fact that the verdict passed at Birmingham was fully confirmed, and the hearty applause bestowed at the conclusion by audience and chorus on the composer, who conducted his work, was the outcome of genuine appreciation. For this satisfactory result, Mr. Cowen was chiefly indebted to the orchestra and chorus. The accompaniments might have been softer in several cases, but in the main the delicate texture of the work lost little in the interpretation given on this occasion, the piquant interchanges of the wood-wind and strings being especially well managed. We have already commented in these notices upon the increased efficiency of the choir, and are glad to record that, with the exception of one undecided entry, their singing was marked by precision, good intonation, and distinct enunciation—qualities which were especially displayed in the Chorus of Fays. The Solo Quartet included two of the original cast, but to only one number of it is unreserved approbation due. Miss Hope Glenn's ringing tones told admirably in the part of the Wicked Fairy, and the sinister character of her ballad, one of the most original numbers of the work, was admirably brought out in her rendering. In the delivery of her recitatives, Mrs. Hutchinson showed her usual distinction of style, but an access of tremolo seriously impaired the effect of her Scena, "Whither away, my heart?" Mr. King, in the small part which falls to the baritone, seemed wanting in colour and incisiveness; and Mr. Winch was so obviously unwell that we can only hope we may soon have an opportunity of hearing him in an important part under more favourable circumstances. The programme included one other item, the "Euryanthe" Overture, which received a fine rendering from the band. Mr. Cowen conducted with judgment and decision throughout. The series recommenced on February 13 with a performance of "The Spectre's Bride," conducted by Mr. Mackenzie, in which Novello's Oratorio Choir will take part, and Madame Albani make her first appearance at these Concerts.

The announcements for the latter half of the season include Brahms's new Symphony and selections from Liszt's compositions, to be performed on April 10, when the great virtuoso will be present. Amongst those who will make first appearances at these Concerts, Signor Bottesini and Pan Franz Ondricek, the Bohemian violinist, justly attract attention. Finally, the management announce their intention of giving Gounod's "Redemption" at an early date in the following season, on the scale of the Handel Festivals.

MONDAY AND SATURDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

THE most noteworthy feature in the conduct of these entertainments during the past month has been the unusual proportion of unfamiliar works and novelties in the programmes. Mr. Arthur Chappell's public do not, like the Athenians of old, run greedily after some new thing, but there is an intelligent minority which desires to keep abreast of the times, musically speaking, and the requirements of this section have received more than ordinary attention of late. Resuming our record, we have first to speak of the Concert of Saturday, November 28, concerning which, however, very few remarks are necessary. It would certainly be out of place to criticise Schubert's "Hungarian" Quartet in A minor and Schumann's Trio in D minor, works which every amateur knows and esteems at their proper worth. Miss Fanny Davies delighted the audience by her beautifully refined rendering of Mendelssohn's Capriccio in F sharp minor and a spirited Gigue by Graun. Another popular success was Signor Bottesini's performance of two movements from his Concerto in F sharp minor for double bass. Mr. Maas has won such favour with Handel's air "Tell fair Irene," that he should make further dives into the scores of the composer's forgotten operas. He would be certain to discover many treasures that would well repay his search. The audience on the following Monday had a rare treat in the performance of Schubert's great Quartet in G (Op. 161). The word "rare" is peculiarly appropriate to the occasion, as for some unaccountable reason we are only permitted to hear this masterpiece at long intervals, this being the third performance since the establishment of the Popular Concerts. There are some works so gigantic in conception, and so stamped with genius and beauty throughout, that it is a positive irreverence to criticise them. Such are Handel's "Messiah" and the ninth Symphonies of Beethoven and Schubert, and the Quartet in G of the last-named composer may be placed in this select category. In it the personality of the man stands fully revealed; it is an intense outpouring of his longings, aspirations, and sufferings, and the tale is told with all the eloquence of a divinely gifted imagination. Long as the Quartet is those who know it well would not sacrifice a single bar, and it certainly did not weary the audience for every movement was enthusiastically applauded and the recall at the end was more than usually hearty. Chopin's Fantasia in F minor, played in his most delicate manner by M. de Pachmann, some solos by Signor Bottesini, and Mozart's Pianoforte Quartet in G minor completed the instrumental programme. There were some manifestations of displeasure after Madame Sinico had sung Handel's "O had I Jubal's Lyre," but they probably had reference to the slipshod accompaniment and not to the vocalist. A Beethoven programme, on Saturday the 5th ult., drew an immense audience, the Bonn master being far more attractive than any other composer at these Concerts. The works presented were the Quartet in E flat (Op. 74), the perennial Kreutzer Sonata and the piano Sonata in C minor (Op. 111). Mr. Charles Hallé gave an extremely fine interpretation of the last-named work, with which Beethoven closed his labours as a composer for the piano-forte. Mr. Ben Davies, who has relinquished the operatic stage for the concert-room, made a favourable impression in airs by Mozart and Mendelssohn.

The Concert of the following Monday merits special attention for its peculiarly constituted programme, not one of the instrumental items being familiar. Even Beethoven's Sonata in F (Op. 54) is but rarely heard, for reasons not far to seek. Coming between the Waldstein and the Appassionata, it is almost crushed by those colossal masterpieces, while as abstract music it is scarcely up to the composer's usual mark. Mr. Charles Hallé, who played it, obtained a unanimous recall. The piano Quartet in E minor, by Fibich (Op. 11), which closed the Concert, is a work of promise. The composer is a Bohemian, and has already written a quantity of music in the Czechish style, of which we are likely to hear a good deal in the future. Passing to the novelties, we have first to notice Brahms's Quartet in C minor (Op. 51, No. 1), the only one of the composer's three Quartets remaining to be heard. The genius of Brahms has not fully manifested itself in this class of composition, the Quartets being decidedly inferior to the Sextets, and also to the works for piano and strings. The example introduced on this occasion, however, is superior to its companion in A minor, particularly in the second and third movements. These are worthy of the composer, while the first and final sections are too sombre and complex to be pleasing. Still if Brahms is sometimes stern and ungenial he is never trivial, and the audience were quick to recognise the good qualities in the C minor Quartet. It is a most extraordinary circumstance that, until this occasion, the name of Emmanuel Bach had never appeared in a Monday Popular programme. No possible reason can be assigned for this neglect, but reparation, though tardy, can be made by frequently introducing examples from his works in the future. There is no occasion to call the attention of readers of THE MUSICAL TIMES to the peculiar claims of Emmanuel Bach to the esteem of musicians. He completely fills the gap which would otherwise have existed between the old and the new—the contrapuntal and the melodic schools of composition—and had Haydn not lived, he would probably have been termed the father of modern music. The Sonata in C minor, for piano and violin, played by Mr. Hallé and Madame Néruda, is not one of his most advanced compositions, but it is full of characteristic touches, and the slow movement in A flat is as truly a song without words as any that Mendelssohn wrote. The Sonata was received with enthusiasm, and Mr. Chappell should take the hint and let us hear more from the same source. A favourable début as vocalist was made by Mr. Clifford Hallé, a son of the pianist and conductor. He possesses a light baritone voice, which he uses in the style of an artist. Volkmann's Quartet in G minor (Op. 14), which opened the Concert of Saturday, the 12th, is one of that generally dry composer's most genial works. The later quartets are said to be elaborate and complex, but that referred to is clear and concise, though not very original. The Scherzo is Mendelssohnian, and there is a palpable reminiscence of Mozart in the Finale. Miss Fanny Davies played Mendelssohn's Andante with Variations in E flat (Op. 82) with singular charm. Madame Néruda introduced a tasteful Berceuse Slave, by her brother, Herr Franz Néruda, and Schumann's ever welcome Quintet in E flat (Op. 44) concluded the programme. The refined singing of Miss Carlotta Elliott was an agreeable feature of the Concert.

The Concert of the 14th ult. resembled that of the previous Monday in the generally unfamiliar character of the programme. It commenced with a Quintet for piano and strings in C minor, by Kiel (Op. 76), which may be regarded as an exceedingly favourable example of what Wagner called Kapellmeister music. Kiel had not a particle of the mysterious gift which we term genius, but by the mere force of industry and learning, he penned a quantity of more or less effective music. The two middle movements of his Quintet in C minor are excellent, and the first and last exhibit a considerable amount of constructive skill. But it would be idle to assert that Kiel is ever likely to be a popular composer, for his music at the best appeals to the intellect rather than the heart. Beethoven's genial Trio for strings in G (Op. 9, No. 1) was the only other work of importance. Miss Zimmermann played Chopin's Nocturne in D flat, and a Toccata in F by Mr. Arthur O'Leary, and Herr Franz Néruda won very warm applause in two violoncello solos by Popper. Mr. Santley sang well-known airs by Handel and Signor Piatti.

The ante-Christmas season closed on Saturday, the 19th ult., with a programme as attractive as any of those on the previous Saturdays. Mozart's Clarinet Quintet retains its power to charm unimpaired, and its performance, with Mr. Lazarus in the leading part, could not well have been more refined and technically perfect. An artistic treat of a different kind was the performance, for the first time, of Spohr's Quartet in A minor (Op. 74, No. 1). This beautiful and masterly work dates from 1827, when its composer's genius was in its fullest activity, and from first to last it is truly delightful. Other quartets of equal excellence, however, remain to be produced, and now that Mr. Arthur Chappell seems to have recognised the advisability of bringing forward those works of the greatest masters hitherto unheard, we may expect to find them in the programmes of the immediate, rather than the dim, future. M. de Pachmann played, in his most delightful manner, Raff's Prelude and Fugue, from his Suite in B minor (Op. 72), and two of Chopin's Etudes; and Mrs. Henschel contributed an extremely interesting selection of songs by Widor, Liszt, Hubert Parry, and Villiers Stanford. Madame Néruda has been the leader throughout the month, and no one would desire a change until Herr Joachim makes his reappearance on March 1.

BRINSMEAD SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

A WELL-SUSTAINED crescendo may be said to describe most accurately the progress of these Concerts, which have been steadily gaining as they succeeded each other, both in the interest attaching to the programmes and the artistic merit of the performances. That the attendance of the public, too, should have proportionately increased is, moreover, a matter of congratulation for the lover of serious music, the last evening of the series being also the one presenting the most crowded aspect. Thus the above undertaking has fully vindicated its raison d'être, quite apart from the charitable object associated therewith, and has, indeed, demonstrated practically what everyone knew to be the fact—viz., that there is room in the Metropolis for a similar institution, where the orchestral works of both classical and modern masters shall be alternately represented. We may venture to hope, therefore, that an artistic enterprise, so well begun, may develop into a permanent feature of London musical life.

We have still to record the remaining two Concerts of this short series, which took place on the 5th and 10th ult., and on which occasions Mr. W. Ganz wielded the bâton de mesure. One of the principal features of the former Concert was the appearance, in his capacity of pianist, of M. Saint-Saëns, who did by the solo-part in his Pianoforte Concerto in C minor (Op. 44) what a clever financier does in dealing with his own property—i.e., he made the most thereof. The Concerto, which we believe has been heard in London before, is an interesting but scarcely a very important addition to the literature of the instrument, being frequently laboured and diffuse, while exhibiting certain mannerisms which can scarcely be called individuality. The animated applause which followed the performance was intended probably quite as much for the skilful executant as for his work. A Septet in E flat, for solo trumpet, strings, and pianoforte, by the same composer (Op. 65), is a far more pleasing composition, if less coherent in form, than the Concerto; a minuet and gavotte especially being notable for refinement and melodious charm. The composer again presided at the pianoforte, while the "solo trumpet" had assumed the shape of a cornet à piston, not perhaps to the advantage of the general dynamic effect of the work, though the latter instrument was admirably played by Mr. McGrath, the "strings" having been those of the orchestra. We do not think that the gifted French composer has any reason to complain of a want of heartiness in the reception he met with during the evening in question. Other numbers in the programme were Raff's clever and imaginative "Lenore" Symphony, a most interesting and legitimate specimen of programme-music, the orchestral Interlude and Valse from Cowen's "Sleeping Beauty," and (to play the people in and out) Weber's "Euryanthe" and Rossini's "Tell" Overtures. Mr. Edward Lloyd caused quite a furor by his most intelligent and sympathetic rendering of Weber's "O 'tis a glorious sight," and Loder's "Wake from thy grave, Giselle," to which he had to add one of Schubert's Lieder before his audience would be satisfied.

At the last Concert of the season there was the embarras de richesses usual on such occasions, the programme including Beethoven's "Egmont" and Wagner's "Tannhäuser" Overtures, Berlioz's Symphony (Op. 4), properly surnamed Fantastique, and Prelude to M. Saint-Saëns's sacred Cantata, entitled "Le Déluge"; all of them works, except the latter, with which amateurs are more or less familiar. Berlioz's gigantic Symphony probably marks the line beyond which so-called programme-music must needs become intolerable, while at the same time it reads a stupendous lesson in orchestration to all modern musicians. It was played with much verve by the excellent forces under Mr. Ganz's command, some portions, particularly the beautiful pastoral scenes of the third movement, evidently creating something more than a mere surface impression upon the audience, many of whom probably listened for the first time to this marvellous production of musical eclecticism. M. Saint-Saëns's Prelude is again a decidedly interesting composition, albeit depending for its artistic passport more upon the skilful orchestration than upon the intrinsic beauty of its themes. It is, moreover, an original idea to introduce—as the composer does—a solo quartet of strings playing with bow, and accompanied by orchestral strings playing pizzicato, the effect being very graceful, if scarcely suggestive, to the unsophisticated musical mind, of the subject it is supposed to foreshadow. The solo quartet was ably sustained by Messrs. Carodius, Nicholson, Doyle, and Howell, and the work was deservedly very well received. On this occasion also the audience were made acquainted with the Prize Pianoforte Concerto which, as already mentioned in our last number, has Mr. Oliver King for its composer, and which was very brilliantly interpreted by Madame Frickenhaus. Mr. King's new work is a distinctly remarkable production, being instinct with a certain dramatic impulse which forces his various motivi into recognition even where the organic life of his movements appears at times somewhat clouded, or his orchestration as yet wanting in variety of colour. The Concerto is written in orthodox form, and the genius of the solo instrument has been well-studied throughout. It was exceedingly well received by the audience, who twice called the composer on to the platform. The lady pianist also played very gracefully Hensel's "Wiegenlied" and a "Scherzo" by Moszkowski. Miss Griswold was the vocalist in airs by Massenet and Leo Délibes, and songs by Schumann, Goring Thomas, and Grieg.

"FAUST" AT THE LYCEUM.

MR. IRVING'S marvellous production will be fully commented on in the "Faust Legend" article in another part of this paper, but as it may be some time before this latest of the many versions of the immortal play can be reviewed, a few words on the music of the Lyceum performance seem desirable while the subject is fresh in people's minds. It has been hinted before, on several sides, that to invest the Lyceum productions with true artistic dignity and worth, music specially written by our foremost composers, and efficiently rendered by a real orchestra and vocalists, is absolutely necessary. Against this course, however, three powerful reasons militate. Firstly, none but the actual musical conductor of the theatre can properly supply those all-important scraps of melodrame music which give life to the whole play; secondly, there is the question of expense (less powerful, of course, at the Lyceum than anywhere); and, thirdly, the entire and absolute indifference of an English theatrical audience as to what music is played. In "Faust" Mr. Irving has certainly deserved the thanks of musicians, though I fear he has earned something very unlike thanks from the bulk of his audience. The six Entr'actes are as follows:—1. Overture "Faust" (Lindpaintner)—this is a very brilliant piece of the Weber school, which might well be heard in the London concert-room. 2. Overture "Faust" (Spohr)—this, it not one of Spohr's very best overtures, is still interesting and good music. 3. Entr'acte, "The Erl King" (Schubert)—If more effectively scored, this would have been an excellent Entr'acte, as it was it gained some slight applause, a favour accorded to no other selection. If the melody sung by the father must be played by that musical abomination, the euphonium, the part of the son should at least be given to the cornet. On the oboe it is simply inaudible. 4. Overture "The Vampyre" (Marschner)—another Weberesque piece, with plenty of noise and bustle, but little thematic interest. The three Overtures were rather too similar in character for good effect. 5 and 6. Entr'actes, Mephistopheles and Margaret (Hamilton Clarke)—these, as well as the greater part of the incidental music, can be unreservedly commended. The programme states that "the incidental music has been specially composed by Mr. Hamilton Clarke and Mr. Meredith Ball, and selections have been made from the works of Berlioz, Lassen, and Beethoven, arranged by Mr. Meredith Ball for the orchestra," but we failed to recognise aught save Lassen's charming "King of Thule" ballad and Berlioz's dance of "Will o' the Wisp." The orchestra, a complete band of about thirty-five, with six first violins and two basses, was efficient; but, in the orchestral interludes, painfully weak. This was not, perhaps, so much owing to want of tone in its members as to the hum, or rather roar, of conversation in the audience. If Entr'actes are intended to be heard in an English theatre, the orthodox ear-splitting combination of cornet, piccolo, and euphonium is the only kind of band which is of any use.

The music then, as a whole, can be highly praised, though it was amusingly despised by the audience. Since the "Faust" music of eminent composers was selected from, there were, doubtless, good practical reasons, which in a theatre must outweigh all others, why it was not drawn upon more largely; why, for instance, Berlioz's Ballet of Sylphs was rejected, or why Lassen's very complete melodramatic music, so striking and brilliant, was not more laid under requisition. Incidental music in an English play has to be so subordinate and subdued that its composer, director, and executants have but a thankless task. Entr'acte music is simply not listened to, so that the vulgarest of dance-music, abominably played, is sufficient cover for conversation. Under this state of things, there was no practical necessity for Mr. Irving to do as much as he has done in the musical accompaniments to his piece, and he, therefore, deserves all the more praise for his sense of artistic propriety.

THE HECKMANN QUARTET.

It has been justly observed that although in the mere technicality of quartet-playing these artists have not afforded any new revelation to English musicians, they have taught us a lesson by their absorption of all individuality in their artistic labours. Each performer regards himself only as a component part of a delicately-organised machine for the interpretation of the thoughts of master minds, and being totally free from all professional jealousies, works cheerfully for the general good. This is the true artistic spirit, and it is not so common that it should be passed over without approving mention whenever it is found. The first of the recent series of Concerts was noticed in our last number, and a few remarks will suffice regarding the remaining performances. On the 8th ult. a Quartet in E flat, by Dittersdorf, was performed. It is a brief, concise, and perfectly intelligible work, in the style of Haydn, of whom Dittersdorf was a contemporary. He was a most prolific composer, and was much esteemed, his operas being in especial favour; but such is the fluctuation of taste, that even a musician at the present day might not feel shame at owning ignorance of his name. The other quartets presented on this occasion were Mozart in C, No. 6, and Beethoven in F (Op. 59), No. 1.

The programme of the 15th was the most interesting of the series. It commenced with a Quartet in G minor, by Grieg, dedicated to Herr Heckmann and his companions. The work is very characteristic of the Norwegian composer, especially in the middle movements, which are charming. One of the best of the Heckmann performances was that of Schubert's magnificent Quartet in G (Op. 161), and the delight of the audience was expressed by long continued applause after every movement. Beethoven's Quartet in E flat (Op. 127) formed an excellent contrast to the preceding works.

The final Concert on the 19th was composed entirely of Beethoven's works, and for the sake of variety the Sonata for pianoforte and violoncello, in A (Op. 69), was introduced between the two gigantic Quartets in A minor (Op. 132) and C sharp minor (Op. 131). It was fairly well played by Frau Heckmann and Herr R. Bellmann. The quartets are now sufficiently familiar to render it needless to describe their characteristics, though to many persons they must ever remain enigmas. Herr Franke announces another series of Chamber Concerts, at which a special feature will be the appearance of a vocal quartet, consisting of Miss Hamlin, Miss Lena Little, Mr. W. J. Winch, and Mr. Otto Fischer.

MR. DANNREUTHER'S CONCERTS.

FAITHFUL to his policy of producing new works by known and unknown composers, Mr. Dannreuther brought forward a Pianoforte Trio in F minor, by W. Weckbecker (Op. 2), at his third Concert on the 3rd ult. Of Weckbecker's antecedents it is impossible to say anything, but if we may judge by his Trio, he is a young musician of no ordinary ability, who only needs experience to mature the talents with which nature has endowed him. In its structural details, his work shows kinship with the modern German school, but the themes are generally melodious, and exhibit an agreeable spontaneity. On the same evening the charming "Weihnachtslieder" of Cornelius (Op. 8), Dr. Hubert Parry's Sonata in A, for pianoforte and violoncello, and Beethoven's Trio in B flat (Op. 97) were included in the programme.

At the fourth Concert, on the 17th ult., a Quintet in E flat, for Strings, by Dr. Hubert Parry, which was introduced last season, was repeated in a revised form. In its present shape the work may be regarded as superior to any of its composer's earlier efforts in the direction of chamber music. The first movement is somewhat vague, but the others are clear and unlaboured, as well as attractive by the tunefulness of the principal themes. In the Scherzo and Finale there is a sense of humour, suggestive of Beethoven in his lighter mood. Mr. Dannreuther played Schumann's Fantasia in C (Op. 17) and Miss Anna Williams gave a very tasteful rendering of Liszt's "Lorelei."

MR. S. H. WALLER'S RECITAL.

THE method of making a public début through the means of an Invitation Concert has this to recommend it to the notice of the nervous aspirant—that the guests asked to attend can hardly have the lack of courtesy to give expression to their critical convictions. Mr. S. H. Waller, who has seen enough of life in its chequered phases to be absolved from the charge of shyness—he made his first appearance, we understand, as a youthful phenomenon, subsequently taking to the profession of arms in an Engineer corps, and ultimately reverting to his early love, music—elected to come before the world of English amateurs as a pianist at a matinée d'invitation, held at Prince's Hall, on the 11th ult. A short programme, consisting of six selections from Beethoven, Chopin, Liszt, Schumann, Grieg, and Rubinstein, sufficed to show off the capacity of the new pianist, and to reveal in what direction the bent of his genius should hereafter be guided. The school in which Mr. Waller has studied is, unfortunately, the sensational one, which takes Liszt for its fountain-head, and seeks to instil the false precept that the real province of the pianoforte is to supplant the orchestra, or to get as near that result as possible. What an infinite amount of pains has been expended, one way and the other, in the pursuit of this ignis fatuus! Nothing comes of all this slap-dash piano banging except the discordant and disagreeable jangle produced by the impact of hammers upon strings never intended to be put in such a vigorous state of vibration. The music of the salt-box, bone, and cleaver is almost as mellifluous as the "blood and iron" performance of Teutonic piano-slayers. Mr. Waller, if he affect the "Ercles" vein, with a result readily to be foreseen, can also, like the Athenian weaver, woo you as gentle as any sucking dove. And to that mood he should be exhorted to confine himself. Pachmann has shown how much real music still lies beneath the keyboard, and Mr. Waller can do no better than take the lesson well to heart. His playing of the Schumann morceaux ("Abends" and "Aufschwung") and Grieg's Sonata was full of delicacy and the charm of repose; but his reading of Beethoven's "Funeral March" Sonata in A flat was distorted, and his performance of Liszt's "Mephisto" Walzer, and Rubinstein's Ballet music from "Der Dämon," might have been the work of feet quite as well as that of hands. If Mr. Waller chooses to take the right path, there is a future yet in store for him.

M. DE PACHMANN'S SECOND RECITAL.

ONE of the largest audiences this season at St. James's Hall, assembled on Monday afternoon, the 14th ult., when M. de Pachmann gave his second Pianoforte Recital. The undiminished popularity of the Russian artist may be regarded on the whole as a healthy sign, for, making allowance for some pardonable mannerisms, his playing comes as near perfection as possible within its own limits, which are clearly defined. Although the names of several of the greatest masters were absent from the programme on the above occasion, the selection was, on the whole, well varied and interesting, a statement that requires some corroboration considering that Beethoven, Mozart, Schubert, and Mendelssohn were unrepresented. Weber's Sonata in E minor, however, was a noteworthy feature, for this very fine and characteristic work is not often heard in public owing to some caprice on the part of pianists. It was played with rare delicacy and feeling, and respect was shown to the original text, which is something in these days of iconoclasm and wilful tampering with the works of master-minds. Exquisite finish and beauty of touch were also exhibited in Raff's Giga with variations, from the D minor Suite (Op. 91), and his popular trifle "La Fileuse," a melodious if not very original Nocturne in A flat by Mr. J. F. Barnett, and various pieces by Liszt, Henselt, Schumann, and Chopin. Some amusement was caused in the Hall by the demonstrative way in which M. de Pachmann expressed his annoyance at the disturbance caused by late-comers. We can sympathise with a sensitive artist under the circumstances; but it must be remembered that many persons come from long distances to St. James's Hall, and those who are dependent upon public conveyances cannot be certain of arriving in time. The best solution of the difficulty is to allow a short pause after every piece, in order to enable those who have been delayed to take their seats quietly.

MR. SILAS PRATT'S CONCERT.

PREVIOUS to his departure for America, Mr. Pratt gave a farewell Concert at the Steinway Hall, on the 4th ult., the programme of which was chiefly formed of his own compositions. We have already dwelt upon the characteristics which distinguish the works of the American musician, that is to say, freshness and sometimes beauty in the ideas, but generally amateurish and clumsy workmanship. These qualities were found in the examples presented on this occasion, which comprised pianoforte solos, songs, and excerpts for string quintet. The interest of the Concert was heightened by the appearance of Herr Hermann Ritter, who played some solos on the viola-alta, which we are told is "fast superseding the old viola in Germany. It is used exclusively in the Meiningen Court Band, and is partly used in many other celebrated orchestras." Further, it was said that Herr Ritter has been engaged by Mr. Manns as the viola leader in the orchestra selected for his present Scotch tour. No explanation was forthcoming of the constructive difference between the viola-alta and the ordinary viola, but the former instrument appeared to be somewhat larger and its tone slightly fuller. The effect of the solos however, was marred by the obvious misunderstanding with the accompanist. Miss Lena Little, Miss Hamlin, and Mr. Orlando Harley rendered able vocal assistance in the Concert.

MR. AND MRS. HENSCHEL'S RECITALS.

THE varied and representative programme which had been provided for the third and concluding afternoon of the present series at Prince's Hall, on the 1st ult., again enabled the above distinguished vocalists to display both the copiousness of their répertoire and the versatility of their talent. Herr Henschel, more especially, excels equally in the interpretation of the most divergent styles, from the florid Aria of the older Italian schools to the subtle poetry embodied in the German Lied. Nor can any fault be found with either his method of voice-production or with his declamation. Where he fails—and it is a failing which might so easily be remedied on the part of so earnest an artist—is in the enunciation of the words, which frequently lacks that emphasis and distinction which form such an essential element in the perfect rendering of the highly developed modern song. We need only refer to the admirable example set in this direction by another German baritone, Julius Stockhausen, in order to convince Herr Henschel that we are not judging his performance by any other than the very highest standard. There was again a fairly numerous audience, who testified by their frequent plaudits to the intelligent appreciation with which the efforts of these excellent artists are being met in the Metropolis. The Recitals are, we believe, to be resumed in the present month.

BOROUGH OF HACKNEY CHORAL ASSOCIATION.

As it would be difficult for this Society to improve its reputation, the next best thing is to sustain it, and this was certainly done by the performance of the "Rose of Sharon," on Monday, the 21st ult. When Mr. Mackenzie's Oratorio was produced with such striking success at Norwich, in October, 1884, the Hackney Society's arrangements for the coming season had been already made, and we may take it that the work has been brought forward as early as possible. Making allowance for the disadvantageous conditions under which performances are given in the Shoreditch Town Hall, "The Rose of Sharon" received the fullest possible justice. The rendering of the choruses was really remarkable for precision and general accuracy, not one noticeable slip occurring from first to last. Considering the very arduous labours which Mr. Mackenzie has imposed upon the choralists, this is no light praise, for it is equal to saying that Mr. Prout and his forces must have laboured very zealously during the brief period since the last Concert. Of the soloists the greatest praise is due to Miss Hope Glenn, who had accepted the engagement at two days' notice, and at some inconvenience to herself. She sang the contralto music, especially the beautiful air "Lo, the King," with great expression and purity of style. Miss Marianne Fenna was somewhat cold, but otherwise acceptable in the title part, and Mr. Henry Guy as the Beloved, and Mr. R. Forington as Solomon, left little to desire.

BOW AND BROMLEY INSTITUTE CHOIR.

IF the opinion is anywhere prevalent that first rate performances of oratorio music in London are only to be heard in St. James's or the Albert Halls, no more effective disproof of its erroneousness could be furnished than such a rendering of "Mors et Vita" as was given under Mr. McNaught's auspices on the 15th ult. The choir acquitted itself admirably throughout, singing with excellent firmness of attack, strict observance of light and shade, and, except in one or two trying passages, each of only a few bars' duration, with faultless intonation. The double chorus "A custodia matutina" was triumphantly concluded without any deflection of pitch, though the number lost considerably in massiveness by the pace at which it was taken. With this sole exception the divergencies in tempo were all in the opposite direction, as may be inferred from the fact that though the "Dies iræ" was omitted, the Requiem occupied exactly the same time in performance as at Birmingham. The quartets "Ingemisco," "Oro supplex," suffered in consequence; but the number which lost most of its effect was the "Judea," which, as is well known, is generally the most applauded in the whole work, and here failed to awake the enthusiasm of a full and decidedly appreciative audience. Where such level excellence was attained throughout, it is hard to particularise, but the "Sanctus" in Part III., the sustaining parts for the solo "Beati qui lavant," excellently sung by Miss Anna Williams, and the fugue "Quam olim Abraham," were perhaps the most successful efforts of the choir. The more purely narrative passages which fall to the baritone part were admirably declaimed by Mr. Ludwig, whose performance on this occasion shows him to possess undoubted capacities of a high order as an oratorio singer. Miss Damian's fine voice was heard to great advantage in the contralto music; a tendency is observable, however, in this singer to slacken the tempo, which she would do well to combat. Miss Anna Williams gave great satisfaction by her earnest and finished rendering of the numerous and grateful solos for soprano with which M. Gounod has enriched his latest work. Of the remaining member of the solo quartet it is unfortunately impossible to speak with high commendation. Mr. McKay possesses an agreeable light tenor voice, but was completely outweighed by the heavier vocal calibre of the other soloists in the quartets, whilst his uncertainty of attack constituted a serious drawback in his individual efforts. An excellent professional orchestra of forty performers, ably led by Mr. Frye Parker, contributed not a little to the all-round character of the performance, which cannot fail to confirm the confidence felt by choir and subscribers in their indefatigable Conductor.

HIGHBURY PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

THE enterprising spirit which marks this excellent Society was sufficiently indicated by the choice of Berlioz's "Childhood of Christ" as the chief attraction of the opening Concert, on the 7th ult. This interesting work, which had the effect of causing Heine to withdraw his statement that the composer had little melody and simplicity, presents, by virtue of its delicate instrumentation, difficulties of the first order to an orchestra mainly composed of amateurs. Hence the treble pianos, which occur so frequently in the score, were never realised, and the accompaniments were almost invariably played too loud. With these deductions we can speak in high terms of the performance. The chorus sang throughout with precision, feeling, and commendable restraint, the composer's minute instructions for securing as ethereal a tone as possible for the unseen angels being excellently fulfilled. The beautiful "Farewell of the Shepherds" (which, as readers of Berlioz's life will remember, was passed off by the author as the composition of an imaginary writer of the 18th century named Pierre Ducré) was also given with considerable delicacy. Amongst the soloists Mr. Chilley deserves high praise for the refinement and finish with which he rendered the tenor music assigned to the Narrator. Miss Anna Williams sang with the thoroughness and good intention always to be expected of that excellent artist, but the part of Mary obviously demands a voice of lighter quality. Efficient aid was lent by Mr. Forington in the part of Joseph, and the minor characters were creditably filled by Messrs. Puttick and Bell. An excellent rendering of the graceful Serenade for two flutes and harp in Part III. was given by Messrs. Carozzi and Davies and Miss Adelaide Arnold. Of Dr. Bridge's efficiency as a Conductor it is needless to speak, and his beat left little to be desired on the score of vigour and clearness. In one or two numbers we have been accustomed to a rather slower tempo, in particular in the case of "The Repose of the Holy Family," where the beautiful cantabile character of the piece is impaired by an enhanced speed. The Concert was concluded by a miscellaneous selection to which the three first-named vocalists contributed songs with signal success.

ROYAL COLLEGE OF MUSIC.

FORTNIGHTLY Pupils' Concerts are a regular institution at the Royal College, but the orchestral performance given on the evening of the 21st ult. was of special interest and importance, as the large proportion of distinguished musicians in the audience testified. The College is still dependent upon some external aid, chiefly in the woodwind department, on these occasions; but the wise resolve of the Council to offer special scholarships for the players of wind instruments at the forthcoming competition will, doubtless, in time, render them entirely independent of such assistance. The programme included such test pieces as Cherubini's "Medea" Overture, Beethoven's E flat Concerto, No. 5, and Brahms's Serenade in D (Op. 11), in all of which a high level of efficiency was attained under Mr. Stanford's bâton. The string contingent, led by Mr. Sutcliffe, a young Lancashire player of remarkable promise, displayed a very nice quality of tone, unanimity of attack, and, in general, excellent intonation. The College possesses in Messrs. Laubach and Carrodus—son of the distinguished violinist—two competent flautists, and in Mr. Bulkiey, a clarinetist, whose good style and beautiful tone would make him already an acquisition to any orchestra. The lion's share of applause justly fell to the young lady who sustained the solo part in the Concerto. Miss Kellett has the rare gift of a round and sympathetic touch. Her rendering of staccato passages is particularly crisp and effective, and her style shows individuality and intelligence, without betraying a vestige of mannerism. With the greater breadth and confidence gained by an extra year or two of study and experience, Miss Kellett cannot fail to make her mark among the ranks of legitimate pianists. In the absence, through indisposition, of one of Madame Lind-Goldschmidt's most promising pupils, the vocal numbers of the programme were confined to one contribution, the great scena "Where art thou father, dear?" from Dvorák's "Spectre of the Bride." Considering the demands upon voice, technique, and dramatic feeling which are made by this song, the rendering given by Miss Drew was very creditable, but the choice cannot be pronounced very judicious for so light a soprano voice as she possesses.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

AN Orchestral Concert was given by the students of this institution at St. James's Hall, on the 18th ult., before a numerous audience. The programme contained only one work by a pupil—an Overture in E, by Mr. Rowland Briant—which evinced marked ability in the young composer, and the effect of good training in the art of instrumentation. The Overture was warmly received, and Mr. Briant called forward and much applauded. A movement from Sterndale Bennett's Concerto in F minor, by Mr. C. S. Macpherson, and Mendelssohn's Serenade and Allegro Giocoso, by Miss Kate Isaacson, showed to advantage both the talents of the executants and the excellent pianoforte teaching in the Academy; a highly favourable impression being also created by Mr. Lewis Hann, in Saint-Saëns's Introduction and Rondo Capriccioso, for the violin. The Concert opened with a remarkably good performance of Cherubini's fine Mass in C, the principal parts being carefully and most effectively rendered by Misses Margaret Hoare, Kate Condy, Annie Griffiths, and Lily Rowe, Messrs. Lawrence Kellie, William D. Foxon, Alec Marsh, and Edward Owen. The other solo vocalists—Misses Kate Johnson, Caroline Miller, Agnes Janson, Emily Armfield, and Mr. B. Grove—gave proof of much talent in their various selections, and the choir throughout the Concert was highly efficient. Mr. W. Shakespeare conducted with his usual care and judgment.

ROYAL NORMAL COLLEGE AND ACADEMY OF MUSIC FOR THE BLIND.

THE Steinway Hall was the scene of a very interesting gathering on the occasion of the farewell Concert given by four pupils of the Royal Normal College and Academy of Music for the Blind, prior to their departure for America, where they are to fulfil engagements under Mr. Theodore Thomas and other conductors of note. Mr. Alfred Hollins is already known as an admirable performer on the pianoforte, and in the triple capacity of solo executant, accompanist, and composer his performance on the night of the 17th ult. was thoroughly worthy of the hearty reception accorded him. His playing of Liszt's arrangement of a Fugue by Bach was remarkable for its crispness and vigour, while in Raff's "Giga con Variazioni" the player displayed perfect command of the key-board, excellent sense of rhythm, strength in octave passages, and executive capacity of a high order. Mr. Hollins was ably seconded by Miss Jeannie Gilbert, who, besides contributing a refined rendering of Beethoven's Sonata (Op. 90), joined him in an admirable performance of Chopin's Rondo for two pianos (Op. 73). In reply to a peremptory recall, the two players gave a still more brilliant and exacting duet, in the rhapsodic style of Liszt, with the utmost spirit and precision. Of the two vocalists, Mr. John Moncur has a sweet and agreeable tenor voice of light calibre, and was heard to advantage in Clay's "I'll sing thee songs of Araby." "My Mary," a simple but musically and graceful MS. song, for tenor, by Mr. Hollins, and quite above the level of the ordinary drawing-room ballad, was encored, and led to the substitution of another effective composition by the same hand. Miss Amelia Campbell contributed songs by Brahms, Rubinstein, and Liszt with signal success. This young lady has a really charming voce di camera, which she manages with excellent effect in pianissimo passages, and her style is spontaneous and winning. Besides the solos already mentioned, she took part with Mr. Moncur in Gounod's Barcarole, "Vedi che bella." A word is due, in conclusion, to the unflinching delicacy and restraint with which the accompaniments were played by Miss Gilbert and Mr. Hollins. These artists, with their excellent Principal, Dr. Campbell and his son, who travel with them, will carry across the Atlantic the heartiest good wishes of all who listened to their admirable efforts. American hospitality and their own talent render their success a foregone conclusion.

"MORS ET VITA" IN STIRLING, N.B.

A PERFORMANCE of Gounod's Trilogy "Mors et Vita" was given on the 11th ult., in the Burgh Hall, Stirling, by the Stirling Choral Society. Additional interest was attached to the occasion from its being the first introduction of the work into the Northern part of the Kingdom, and many strangers were attracted from Glasgow, Edinburgh, and all parts into the picturesque castellated town to hear it. It may at once be stated that the performance was in every respect a complete success. The solos of the Oratorio were entrusted to the care of Mrs. Hutchinson, Miss Hilda Wilson, and Messrs Edward Lloyd and Watkin Mills, and, as need hardly be said, were done every justice to. Mrs. Hutchinson was especially happy in her rendering of the charming melody "Felix culpa" and in the "Beati qui lavant," and Mr. Lloyd created a marked impression in the grand air "Inter oves" of the Sanctus. The orchestra, under the skilful leadership of Mr. W. H. Cole, although the effect suffered somewhat from the want of a few extra brass instruments, played the accompaniments and the instrumental numbers with feeling and discretion. Mr. Cherry (Brechtin) was at the organ.

We have, however, to speak of the choir with very special commendation. Although hardly exceeding one hundred voices, the body of tone produced throughout showed their unusual excellence and training. The delicacy of the pianissimo with which they opened the Introit and Kyrie, and indeed their perfect rendering of the whole movement, with its gradations of tone, were most praiseworthy. Throughout the entire work the choir, which from the first took very warmly to the music, achieved a series of successes; sharpness of attack, as well as attention to the nuances and to correctness of intonation, marking this part of the performance. The Oratorio, which, it may be mentioned, was sung to the English text, was received by a large and fashionable audience with the most decisive expressions of approbation; indeed, we may more correctly say with the greatest enthusiasm. The prevailing opinion is that it will be most gladly heard again North of the Tweed. Mr. C. E. Allum, who has so long been Conductor of the Society, and upon whom the performance reflected the highest credit, conducted with his usual skill and judgment, holding his forces well together—the orchestra and the chorus, by the way, met together for the first time on the night of performance. Mr. Allum took some of the numbers a degree faster than they were taken, we believe, at Birmingham, thus bringing the performance, with only one slight excision, within two and a half hours, and with improvement, rather than detriment, to the general effect.

THE "EUMENIDES" AT CAMBRIDGE.

On the 1st ult., and four following days, the Cambridge Committee for the performance of Greek plays presented the "Eumenides" of Æschylus in the Theatre Royal, with new incidental music by Mr. C. Villiers Stanford. It will be in remembrance that the "Ajax" of Sophocles was produced under like conditions some time ago, the composer in that case being Professor Sir George Macfarren, the "Birds" of Aristophanes following, with a setting of the choruses by Mr. Hubert Parry. These revivals have, therefore, a double interest—first, they realise to eye and ear, as far as modern conditions allow, the masterpieces of Greek dramatic art; and, next, they make important contributions to English music. The last-named point chiefly concerns us here, and we cannot, with our limited space, attempt to rival, or even to supplement, the copious notices which appeared in several of the daily journals. It would, however, be ungracious to withhold warm acknowledgment of the spirit and manner in which the last play of the soldier-poet's great trilogy was produced. We may wonder why the committee did not begin at the beginning, and play the "Agamemnon" first, so that the entire story of Orestes might in time be set forth. But that they did not affect in no degree our admiration of the task actually achieved, or lessens the pleasure with which we look back upon it. Great difficulties had to be overcome in putting the "Eumenides" on so small a stage as that at Cambridge. The scenery was necessarily out of proportion, the figures in the tableaux were much crowded, and the chorus-players had far from sufficient room for their weird dances. These drawbacks could not be helped, and we only marvel at the skill with which their effect was as far as possible modified. The characters were entrusted to Miss J. E. Case, late of Gorton (Athena); Mr. M. A. North, Christ's (Prophets); Mr. D. N. Pollock, King's (Apollo); Mr. A. R. Macklin, Caius (Orestes); Mr. C. Platts, Trinity (Shade of Clytemnestra); Mr. A. V. Baillie, Trinity (Hermes); Mr. B. V. Sortain, Caius (Herald), and Mr. S. M. Leathes, Trinity (Chorus-Leader). The Chorus of Furies numbered fourteen voices, and the Chorus of Attendants, eleven—all members of the University. Nothing could exceed the earnest spirit in which the actors did their work. Something of the dignity and seriousness of Greek drama was reflected on every hand, and a succession of critical audiences acknowledged with unanimous voice the high intelligence and ability displayed. The whole revival, in short, was an honour to the University, and all who took part in it deserve well of their Alma Mater.

Turning to Mr. Stanford's incidental music we find fifteen numbers, headed by an Overture of classic design, though not of great elaboration. It is an example of singular clearness and force, while its contrast of theme and treatment suggests that of the play itself. Mr. Stanford has written nothing more straightforward in character, or more definite in expression. He is happy, too, in his themes, especially the second, which is graceful enough for alliance with Greek art. The second number consists of orchestral music in accompaniment of the Priestess's monologue before the altar, and also after her discovery of Orestes and the Furies in the shrine. Here we have a theme representative of Apollo, and destined to prominence hereafter. It is well worthy of the honour:—

The third number is also melodrama. It attends upon the invocation of the Furies by the Shade of Clytemnestra, who has a Leitmotiv of her own—and after it comes the first chorus, "Deceived, deceived," in which the Furies reproach themselves for the escape of Orestes, and taunt his protector, Apollo. The voices are kept in unison, as a rule, but sometimes break into two parts, and the whole of the music is strikingly vigorous in character and expression, helped largely to this by the free play of varying rhythms. Prominent use is made, in the orchestra, of the Clytemnestra motif, which is heard also in No. 5—a short Allegro accompanying the exit of the Furies in further search of their victim. No. 6 is an Entr'acte (Allegro con fuoco) in C minor, with a coda in C major, introducing the second subject of the Overture. The hurrying triplets of this movement, and its strong rhythm, admirably suggest the fierce pursuit of Orestes by the avengers of blood, while the calm beauty of the C major finale is no less eloquent of the protecting gods. In the next chorus, "Beware, beware," sung by the Furies as they track their victim to the shrine of Athena, close connection is maintained with the first part of the Entr'acte, and a fine contrast is obtained when the avengers turn from the expression of mere blood-thirstiness to proclaim themselves the ministers of "enthroned justice." Throughout the work, Mr. Stanford is very happy in these changes, and this is one of the best. No. 8—a setting of the Furies' Binding Hymn—is not only the longest, but the finest portion of the work. The composer rises here to the height of a great argument, and expresses all the force and character of the text. A sequence of monotone passages, the pitch of which steadily ascends through part of the scale, while the orchestra keeps on repeating a kind of motto phrase—is particularly effective. So are the sudden invocation of Night (Lento maestoso), and the fine climax in B major, with which the number ends. The next chorus, "Now shall justice wholly fail," sung after the intervention of Athena, strikes a different chord. Disappointment and despondency take the place of fierce anticipation of gluttoned vengeance, and the composer gives these feelings appropriate expression. The number, it is true, cannot compare with its predecessor in powerful effect, but it has strong points, nevertheless, and brings down the curtain on a decided musical impression. No. 10 is an Entr'acte and Introduction (molto moderato) in C major, accompanying the entry of Athena and the Areopagites to try the case of Orestes. We now get relief from the wild appeals of the Furies, and classic elegance of phrase and beauty of colour reign supreme—

But in No. 12, the "unclean maidens" burst in, full-voiced as ever, with angry reproaches of the "young gods and gay." Here large use is made of the first subject in the Overture, that being, indeed, the basis of the entire chorus. The Overture is also drawn upon in the following chorus, "Shall it be borne?" and a reference to "Mother Night" brings in the motto phrase quoted above. From all this a happy and grateful change is made in No. 14, to the music of the now appeased Furies—Furies no longer, but Enneides, "Beneficent ones." This transformation finds full expression in the music, with its harp accompaniment, and melodious well-balanced phrases. The theme, it should be observed, is the one last quoted as part of the Introduction. With this, the final chorus, "Proudly pass home with our solemn escort," is in just accord. In this case the second subject of the Overture comes once more to the front, where it is always welcome, and so, in the pleasantest fashion, the music ends.

From the mere outline which is all we have attempted to give, it is plain that Mr. Stanford has treated his old-world subject with much success, and improved his position as a composer, not only of skill, but imagination. The work should undoubtedly be heard in London, and, we trust, will shortly enjoy that distinction.

The performance at Cambridge, under Mr. Stanford's own direction, was excellent as to the orchestral part, and fairly good as regards the choral music. Of the general effect of the drama, we could speak at length and in enthusiastic terms. Nothing more impressive of its kind ever called forth the plaudits of an intelligent audience.

MUSIC IN BIRMINGHAM.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

AFTER the political excitement which marked the closing days of November, the soothing influence of music during the past month has been doubly welcome, but in many cases the adverse influences of bad trade, and the distractions of the Christmas season, have been only too apparent in the attendance, and it is to be feared that the season, however interesting from a musical point of view, will not prove a particularly satisfactory one for musical caterers.

The musical event of the month has been Mr. Stockley's second Orchestral Concert, which took place on the 10th ult., when Mlle. Elly Warnots and Signor Foli, in the vocal department, co-operated with Mr. Carrodus and the band. The programme was of exceptional interest and excellence, comprising two works by Beethoven, his Overture in C (Op. 124) and his Symphony in A (Op. 92), Professor Macfarren's Violin Concerto in G minor, the "Sylvia" suite de ballet by Delibes, Auber's Overture to "Zanetta," and a selection from Cowen's Cantata "Sleeping Beauty." The Beethoven Symphony, which dates from the prolific year 1812, is, perhaps, the least familiar of the great tone-poet's Symphonies, and has been only once before attempted at a Birmingham Concert. Its essentially military spirit was well realised in the performance, which was a highly creditable one for all concerned, excepting in one passage of the Finale, where there was a little temporary unsteadiness. The beautiful Allegretto in A minor was charmingly played. In the "Weihe des Hauses" Overture, which belongs to a later period than the Symphony (1822), the playing of the band in the fugal second part was especially praiseworthy. Mr. Carrodus gave a magnificent rendering of the solo portion of the Concerto, originally performed by Herr Ludwig Straus in 1873, and impressed the audience more particularly by his playing of the elaborate cadenza in the first movement. At a later period he excited great enthusiasm by the rare technical qualities revealed in his performance of "Le Tremolo" of De Beriot, founded on the Andante theme of the Kreutzer Sonata. The selection from "Sleeping Beauty" comprised two movements, the Allegro vivace in E major, entitled "Maidenhood, and Dreams of Love," and the Tempo di valse in B flat, both admirably played. The "Sylvia" ballet music had been previously given at these Concerts, and with the Auber Overture most of the audience were already familiar. In the vocal department Mlle. Elly Warnots, the Belgian prima donna, won great applause by the charm of her pure, resonant, and flexible soprano voice, and the artistic style of her singing, and Signor Foli sang with his customary spirit and power. Dr. R. M. Winn was an excellent accompanist, and Mr. Stockley's conducting was marked by judgment and decision.

The eighth Artisans' Concert of the Midland Musical Society, on the 15th ult., afforded the public a second hearing of the new Cantata "Torfrida," first produced here some twelve months ago, by Mr. W. Moore, a Birmingham instrumentalist, who took part in the performance. Mr. Moore has been unfortunate in his libretto, which is based upon a wild Scandinavian legend of no great dramatic value, but his music is tuneful and expressive, and though not conspicuous for scholarship or modern ideas, is generally correct and tasteful in the scoring. Mr. Moore should be capable of better things. The performance on the whole was a very creditable one, alike as to band, chorus, and principals (including Miss Fraser Brunner, Mr. Charles Banks, and Mr. George Harris), and the composer was honoured with a call on the conclusion of the work.

At the closing Concert of the 1885 series of the Musical Association, which took place in the Town Hall, on the 5th ult., the first part was devoted to an operatic Recital, the garden scene from Gounod's "Faust," in which Miss Dakin impressed the audience very favourably by her skillful rendering of the "Jewel Song," whilst Madame Maas as Siebel, Mr. Chille as Faust, and Mr. Snaelle as Mephistopheles acquitted themselves very creditably in their respective parts. In the second part, a clarinet solo by Weber was capably played by Mr. F. E. Walter, and songs were contributed by the above-named vocalists.

Only bare mention was possible last month of the excellent Concert of the Festival Choral Society which took place on November 26, when Dvorák's Cantata "The Spectre's Bride" was bracketed with Spohr's "God, Thou art Great," and Mendelssohn's eight-voice setting of the 114th Psalm. The performance of the first-named Cantata, though not comparable to that which it received at the Festival of August last, was, nevertheless, a very creditable and effective one, and the many original and striking beauties of the work evidently produced a deep impression upon the audience. Miss Annie Marriott (who replaced Madame Valleria at a very short notice) showed great dramatic intensity in the part of the heroine, and her singing, more particularly of the pathetic opening solo, "Where art thou, father dear?" in the song narrating the lovers' compact, and in the final prayer, "O Virgin Mother," was marked by refinement and vocal skill of no mean order. Mr. Harper Kearton, in the tenor part of the Spectre lover, was expressive and effective, though occasionally overweighted by the accompaniment, but Mr. Barrington Foote was scarcely equal to the exigencies of the Narrator's part, which demands vocal powers of a very perfect and cultured order for its due effect. The chorus singing was admirable throughout, and, barring a little occasional roughness, the band accompaniments left nothing to be desired. Of the performance of Spohr's Cantata, in which the previous trio of soloists was joined by Miss Simpson, a local artist, it would be superfluous to speak, but after the weird and exciting incidents of Dvorák's work, Spohr's smooth and reposeful harmonies afforded a contrast so marked as to be almost in the nature of an anti-climax. The choral singing, however, both in this work and in Mendelssohn's Psalm, was perfect in its way.

There is to be a great gathering of the musical clans here at the anniversary of the Birmingham Clef Club, on the 22nd inst., when Sir Arthur Sullivan (the President of the Club), Sir Geo. Grove, Mr. F. H. Cowen, Mr. Charles Hallé, Mr. Prout, Mr. Praeger, Mr. Santley, and other musical celebrities have promised to attend the anniversary Concert and dinner. For the former, several novelties are promised by the President, Mr. Cowen, Mr. J. F. Barnett, and Dr. Bridge.

The Birmingham and Midland Musical Guild gave a novel Concert on the 21st ult., when the programme was composed entirely of works by the members.

The Festival Choral Society gave their Christmas performance of "The Messiah" on the 26th ult., with Mrs. Hutchinson, Miss Hilda Wilson, Mr. Maas, and Mr. Bridson as vocal principals.

MUSIC IN LIVERPOOL. (FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

THE round of Christmas festivities brings with it the usual series of almost innumerable "Messiah" performances, which are now taking place nightly in Liverpool and the neighbourhood. Before referring to these, however, we must record the classical events which have come and gone during the past month.

At Mr. Hallé's third Concert, at the Philharmonic Hall, on November 24, the item of paramount interest was Dvorák's Pianoforte Concerto in G minor. This was its first performance in Liverpool, and whilst in the hands of Mr. Hallé its themes appeared to be comparatively simple in their character, contrasted with many of the other efforts of this composer, the same command of orchestration was evidenced throughout the entire development of the work. Raff's "Hungarian Suite" in F—also a novelty—did duty at this Concert for the usual symphony, and although lacking the orthodox form and consecutive construction of the better known class of work, its performance—an admirable one—served to impress its auditors with a sense of Raff's superior powers and ability in writing for a large orchestra. The fourth movement of this work was particularly enjoyable, with its luxuriant passages for the wood-wind and cellos. The other instrumental works comprised Cherubini's Overture "Les deux Journées," the Overture to "La Dame Blanche," and Boccherini's delightful Menuetto in A major. Miss Hilda Wilson was the vocalist, being specially successful in Gounod's seldom-heard song "The Golden Thread."

At the following Concert of this series, which took place on the 8th ult., the programme included Field's Pianoforte Concerto in C minor and Beethoven's Symphony in B flat. Dvorák's "Three Légendes," from Op. 59, afforded another example of this prominent composer's versatility, and the other orchestral items comprised Mendelssohn's bright and breezy Overture "The Hebrides" and the Overture to "Zampa." Mr. Charles Hallé's pianoforte selections included, in addition to the Concerto, an Impromptu, by Chopin, and Brahms's Scherzo in E flat minor. Miss Mary Davies sang with her usual artistic taste the air "Where art thou, father?" from Dvorák's "Spectre's Bride," and two of Schumann's Lieder.

The fifth Concert of the present season of the Philharmonic Society was held on the 1st ult., and was mainly of an instrumental character. Foremost amongst the orchestral works was Spohr's Symphony, No. 5, in C minor, which, as a specimen of profound and scholarly writing, was listened to with earnest and appreciative attention. Its performance, as well as that of Reinecke's descriptive composition entitled "An adventure of Handel's," was irreproachable. Mr. Anton Dubrucq, a prominent member of Mr. Hallé's orchestra, rendered a solo on the oboe with considerable facility of execution, and Mr. Maas, as solo vocalist, gave two or three operatic selections in his usual perfect style.

A Grand Pianoforte Recital, held in the small concert-room of St. George's Hall, on the afternoon of Saturday, the 5th ult., afforded a better opportunity of studying the artistic capabilities of M. Vladimir de Pachmann than could be gained at his recent appearance at the Philharmonic Hall. There is little doubt that since M. Pachmann's last visit to Liverpool he has made a marked advance in solidity of style and intention, and although his selections from the highest classical works—such as Beethoven's Sonata, No. 2, which was included in the programme of the recital under review—are somewhat lacking in breadth and power, his interpretation of Chopin, Weber, and Henselt is a very near approach to the highest perfection. The most notable items of his performance were Weber's Rondo Brilliant and the charming Romance by Henselt, "Si oiseau j'étais," which was received and applauded with the utmost eagerness.

The Philharmonic Society's performance of "The Messiah," on the 22nd ult., was fully up to the standard required for its efficient presentation. The orchestra was admirable in its verve and adhesion, and the choir, whilst perhaps somewhat lacking in body in the more massive numbers, did their work intelligently. The artists comprised Miss Anna Williams, Miss Hilda Wilson, Mr. Winch, and Mr. Watkin Mills, and Mr. W. T. Best at the organ. Mr. Hallé was the Conductor.

The usual performance of Handel's great Oratorio by the Philharmonic Choral Society took place in St. George's Hall, on the 29th ult., and although too late for notice in this issue, it was confidently expected that it would maintain the high reputation enjoyed by this Society. The principals were Miss Alice Parry, Mdlle. Agnes Janson, Mr. Maldwyn Humphreys, and Mr. Alec Marsh.

Another of the performances which are periodically held at the Pro-cathedral, was given on the 17th ult., when Spohr's "Last Judgment" was rendered with an augmented choir, under the direction of the Cathedral organist, Mr. F. H. Burstall, and reflected considerable credit on the performers, the solos being allotted to members of the Cathedral choir.

The forthcoming season of opera in Liverpool promises to be as successful and as full of novelty as any of its predecessors. Mr. Carl Rosa has just issued the programme of his intended work, which will commence at the Court Theatre on the 4th inst. In addition to the London success—Mr. Goring Thomas's "Nadeshda"—we are to have for the first time in Liverpool performances of Maillart's "Fadette," which has been specially prepared for the Carl Rosa Company from the continental opera "Les Dragons de Villars," and also Marchetti's romantic opera "Ruy Blas," in addition to which a revival of Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro" is promised, with a specially strong cast of principals.

MUSIC IN YORKSHIRE.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

ALREADY preparations have commenced for the holding of the Leeds Musical Festival next year, some particulars of which will be found in another column.

The Leeds Amateur Orchestral Society gave its first Concert of the season in the Albert Hall, on the 14th ult. In face of great difficulties the Society has persevered, and now, with the help of Mr. J. P. Bowling, the Conductor, it is able to give an excellent performance. Their selections on this occasion were of a popular type, and were played with precision and general efficiency. The soloists were Mr. B. M. Carodus (violin) and Mr. Staniland Hall (flute), whose performances aroused considerable enthusiasm. Miss Alice Broadhurst was the vocalist.

Herr Christensen gave the second of his series of Chamber Concerts on the 15th ult., in the Albert Hall, Leeds. He was assisted by Miss Emily Shinner (violin) and Herr Alfred Giessing (violinello), and several works of much interest were given. One of the items selected was Beethoven's Trio in C minor (Op. 1, No. 6), which received a highly sympathetic interpretation. Miss Shinner's violin playing again elicited much admiration. Her rendering of Handel's Sonata in A was especially refined and delicate. Herr Giessing rendered a solo from Goltermann's Concerto in A minor, and made a thoroughly successful first appearance in Yorkshire. He exhibited fine taste and purity and clearness of intonation. Herr Christensen contented himself with one solo, the March from "Tannhäuser," which elicited an encore. The pianist was also represented by an Impromptu for piano, violin, and cello, in three movements, all of which are well written and full of melodic beauty. The vocalist was Miss Letitia Moore, whose well cultivated mezzo-soprano was heard to great advantage.

Arrangements are being made in Leeds for the holding of a series of Popular Saturday Evening Concerts, on a similar scale to those now being given in Birmingham, Manchester, Newcastle, and other populous centres. Military and other bands will be engaged, in addition to leading vocalists in the North of England.

On November 27, Mr. Stocks Hammond gave an Orchestral Concert in the Bradford Technical College Hall, which was well filled by an appreciative audience. The local instrumental resources of Bradford stand in need of considerable improvement, and Mr. Hammond's attempt to establish an orchestra deserves encouragement. The Concert was an agreeable one and served to bring out a fund of talent which promises well for the success of Mr. Hammond's effort. The Overture to "Prometheus," and that to "Der Freischütz," proved the most difficult tests, and on the whole the orchestra came through with credit. They were much more successful, however, in the waltz music, operatic selections, and similar music, of which the rest of the programme consisted. A feature of some interest was a new Symphony, by Mr. F. Kilvington Hattersley, which was well received. Miss Kate Davies and Mr. Henry Pope were the vocalists.

Berlioz's instrumental music to "Romeo and Juliet" occupied a prominent place in the programme of the third Subscription Concert in Bradford, which took place on the 11th ult. The Concert was almost entirely orchestral, and Mr. Hallé's band was considerably augmented, chiefly, it was understood, on account of the Berlioz music. The Symphony did not fully realise all that was expected of it, although the interpretation was chaste, and tone perfect in every particular. It was not until the "Mab" Scherzo had been reached that the audience warmed into sympathy with the composer. The beautiful "Oberon" Overture, with which the Concert opened, afforded occasion for new delight, rendered, as it was, with all the dash and piquancy of which Mr. Hallé's orchestra is capable, and was one of the most charming contributions of the evening. Equally well appreciated was the Overture to "Lohengrin," in which the trombones were exceedingly good. Liszt's Rhapsodie Hongroise in F was remarkably well played, but it met with but scanty approval. Not so, however, the "Athalie" Overture, which, although it was the last item on the programme, kept the audience to the end. The vocalist was Madame Albani. M. Brossa gave an admirably-executed flute accompaniment to one of Madame Albani's songs, and shared with the vocalist a hearty recall. The hall was crowded.

Mr. Charles Henrich, Jun., who achieved very high reputation last winter, gave a Pianoforte Recital on the 15th ult., in the Bradford Church Institute. Mr. Henrich again established his position as an accomplished pianist. His rendering of four of Chopin's works provided him with material with which to exhibit, not only extraordinary powers of execution, but of a rare gift of intellectuality. In addition to the first movement of Chopin's first Concerto (Op. 11), to which Mr. E. Misdale supplied an accompaniment, the Scherzo in B minor, the Nocturne in G, and the Study in A minor, Mr. Henrich's selections included a Ballade by Reinecke, and a Study by Dupont, "Le Staccato Perpétuel." Altogether the Concert was one of the most enjoyable of its kind.

An excellent performance of "The Messiah" was given by the Dewsbury Choral Society on the 19th ult. The principals were: Miss Albu (formerly of Leeds), who gave an admirable rendering of the soprano solos, being especially successful in "Rejoice greatly," "Come unto Him," and "I know that my Redeemer liveth"; Miss Hilda Wilson, who gave "He was despised" with much fervour and expression; Mr. Walter Howgate and Mr. Henry Sunman, both of whom elicited frequent applause. The choir (assisted by about fifty members of the Leeds Philharmonic Society) was thoroughly efficient. Mr. J. W. Fitton presided at the harmonium, Mr. J. W. Bowling led the band, and Mr. Alfred Broughton conducted.

MUSIC IN MANCHESTER.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

SINCE I last wrote Dvorák's music has been in great request here. Mr. Hallé's production of "The Spectre's Bride" attracted an immense audience, and left a very marked impression and the recognition of strong dramatic power of a weird, if not of a very varied, tone. The work had the advantage of the interpretation of Madame Albani and Messrs. Lloyd and Santley, and its repetition would please many of Mr. Hallé's subscribers. The second performance of the Pianoforte Concerto deepened the conviction the work had previously made. Of the piquancy and spirit of the concluding movement no question could arise; but many musicians, well qualified to estimate the merits of the composition, found in the opening section a want of sustained power and a somewhat discursive treatment of the two brief themes. At the Concert of the 10th ult., the three "Légendes" (Nos. 4, 8, and 9) from Op. 55, that were intended for performance earlier in the season (but were postponed because of the non-arrival of the parts), were given. Possibly, had some clue to the meaning of the short pieces been afforded, greater interest might have been excited; but, certainly, the "Légendes" fell flat, and a somewhat monotonous influence resulted from the oft-repetition of certain peculiarities of instrumentation, such as the use of the very highest notes of the violins. Some clever, but not exciting, variations by Brahms, upon the choral "St. Antoni," were included in the programme.

English music has not been brought to the fore to any great extent. The most important work performed—the "Sleeping Beauty" of Mr. Cowen—was introduced to Manchester by the Athenæum Musical Society, and the melodious and unstrained style of the Cantata elicited great applause. But in Mr. Hallé's programmes we have had only a few detached songs, and those not very well selected for isolation from their accessories. Charming delicate as is Mr. Stanford's "There is a bower of roses" ("Veiled Prophet"), it needs for full appreciation some hint of its situation and meaning in the opera. And the very simplicity which so admirably fits Goring Thomas's "As when the snow-drift," as the song whereby the simple peasant girl conveys the welcome of his serfs to the kind master, from whom they hope for protection and increased liberty, renders it a somewhat tame relief in a Concert programme when interposed between two long and serious instrumental works. It is very questionable whether the cause of English music may be advanced thus. The severance of a really dramatic song from its natural surroundings is always dangerous, and must necessarily detract from its effect. And it is a pity that an idea should be started that such selections ever give any adequate conception of the merit of the works from which they are chosen. People, who have not proper opportunities of becoming acquainted with important and serious works of art, are apt to form very hasty opinions from a little disappointment, that is almost inevitable when they are required suddenly to withdraw their thoughts from a symphonic masterpiece that has completely dominated them, and to imagine themselves in a beautiful garden, surrounded with strange enchantments and fascinations, or amid a crowd of expectant and excited serfs. Precisely thus, mischief was done last season by the introduction into the very fragmentary and irrelevant selections that form the bulk of our programmes, of movements from Mackenzie's "Rose of Sharon," when even so melodious and graceful a song as "The Lord is my Shepherd," lost much of its meaning and point, through the audience being, as it were, hurried to it from an entirely different scene with which the Sulamite's grateful reminiscences of her youth spent in the Vineyards of Lebanon had no affinity or consonance.

I need not specify the singers we have had during the month, but Mr. Hallé deserves thanks for again engaging a pianist so sympathetic as M. Vladimir de Pachmann, whose delicacy of touch and minutely shaded gradations of tone and power greatly charmed an enthusiastic crowd.

Mr. De Jong, besides introducing some young singers that otherwise would have difficulty in obtaining a hearing here, has presented a promising young violinist—Miss Kate Chaplin—of whom we shall hear again. Mr. Barrett's Monday Evening Concerts are making way, and also encouraging local talent.

At the Concert Hall the Pianoforte Recitals flourish, and serve an educational purpose, as well as an agreeable afternoon's recreation. And, as a change to the Orchestral Concerts, the Risegari Quartet party (with the aid of a young pianist—Miss Wilkinson) has been introduced, and delighted an intelligent gathering of musicians by very polished ensemble playing. Mr. Watson's Vocal Society sang a few part-songs and glees, but, possibly from the nervousness of an unaccustomed position, not with so much finish as at a later Concert at the Free Trade Hall.

As usual, we have musically celebrated Christmas by some six or seven performances of "The Messiah" at the Free Trade Hall, and by many less pretentious interpretations of the same work by suburban societies. I suppose that in every town, and almost in every village in Lancashire, Handel's great work has—during the early weeks of December—been attacked, often with less reverence than vigour. My experience is that—with rare and honourable exceptions—the respect paid to the author's intentions is, often, in inverse proportion to the celebrity and costliness of the singer. To such an extent have liberties with Handel's notes, rhythm, and general design sometimes prevailed, that our most experienced local critic has been moved by dread of what would occur could the fiery old composer return to the flesh, and superintend, or listen to, the presentation of his sublime settings of Holy Writ. Some discipline as strict as—if less violent than—that which subdued Cuzzoni is certainly required. "Rejoice greatly" is now degraded into the staccato semblance of an operatic bravura display; "Come unto Him" goes gliding and drawing along without any attention to rhythm; and "I know that my Redeemer liveth," is mercilessly cut up into convenient little phrases; breath being taken anywhere, to the utter destruction of all dignity and meaning. Thus, and in many similar ways, is rendered evident the natural result of an irreverent familiarity. But an expensive and extolled professional singer ought to be able to sing a semiquaver passage with the same smoothness and honesty that are exacted from the members of the choir in attacking the far more difficult florid divisions of "For unto us" and "His yoke is easy," and to phrase even the most exacting of Handel's songs in an intelligent manner. The able critic of the Manchester Guardian wrote not one whit too severely when he stated that "a conductor ought not to allow such perversions of musical rhythm as the caprice of female vocalists" sometimes effects.

Mr. Hueffer has been lecturing upon Wagner, his life, and the general plan of his works. Some disappointment was felt by his audience that more light was not thrown upon many points much controverted. The Chairman—Mr. E. J. Broadfield—truly said that the listeners were prepared to approach the subject in an unprejudiced manner, having advanced far beyond the first unheeding, unbelieving, half-contemptuous spirit in which too often new doctrines are treated. But most of the lecturer's time was occupied in describing the plots of the various operas, rather than in explanation of the grounds upon which he based the high claims he advanced. The "essentials" and the "non-essentials" of form were referred to, but not examined, so that the musicians present were not enlightened one iota; and those whose notions of structural outline and development are vague and shadowy obtained no firmer ideas. Possibly the lectures upon Liszt and Berlioz (whose "Faust" is to be given by Mr. Hallé on the 31st) may be more instructive. I believe that good work might be done by any able lecturer who would undertake to clear away the obscurities that are allowed to hang over the claims of our modern writers; to explain, in a common sense and non-technical manner, what "form" in musical composition really is, and in what respects and to what degree new ideas concerning its rules and requirements are now, and may be, tolerated.

MUSIC IN THE WEST.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

The second of Mr. Viner Pomeroy's Classical Chamber Concerts took place on the 2nd ult., at the Victoria Rooms. The occasion was rendered specially interesting by the first appearance in Bristol of Mr. Algernon Ashton, who came forward in the double character of composer and pianist. The other executants were, as usual, Messrs. Henry Holmes, John Pardew, Ellis Roberts, and J. Pomeroy. The Concert opened with Mozart's Quartet for Strings in F major, No. 8, which was excellently rendered. This was followed by four Pianoforte Solos, of Mr. Ashton's own composition, which were received with great favour, and the same composer's Sonata for Pianoforte and Violin (Op. 3), finely interpreted by the composer and Mr. Henry Holmes. The second part of the programme included three lovely Violin Solos, composed by Mr. Alfred Holmes, and exquisitely rendered by his brother. The Concert concluded with fragments of a String Quartet by Mendelssohn.

The first of four Subscription Chamber Concerts took place at the Victoria Rooms, Clifton, on the 7th ult., before a crowded audience. The performers were Miss Mary Lock (piano), Mr. Arthur Hudson (violin), Mr. Edward Pavey (violinello), and Mr. Montague Worlock (vocalist). Beethoven's Trio in E flat (Op. 1), and Gade's Trio "Novelletten," were performed by Miss Lock, Mr. Hudson, and Mr. Pavey, and the beauties of the compositions were forcibly brought out by these accomplished musicians. Miss Lock contributed two pianoforte solos by Schumann, "Des Abends" and "Aufschwung," in excellent and finished style. Mr. Hudson and Miss Lock rendered Grieg's Sonata in G (Op. 13), for violin and piano; Mr. Edward Pavey received an encore for his violinello solo "Reverie," by Dunkler, and Mr. Montague Worlock contributed three songs in good style.

A meeting of the members and friends of the Society of Professional Musicians was held at the St. Paul's Lecture Hall, Clifton, on the 7th ult., under the presidency of Mr. James Greenwood, when an excellent address was delivered by the chairman on the Society of Professional Musicians, its aims and objects.

The Plymouth Vocal Association gave its first Subscription Concert for the season 1885-86 on Wednesday, the 9th ult., at the Guildhall, Plymouth, when the chief work performed was Cowen's "Rose Maiden." The soloists were Miss Ada Patterson, Miss Goodfellow, Mr. Sidney Tower, and Mr. Barrington Foote; solo harpist, Mr. French Davis; principal violins, Mr. J. Pardew and Mr. J. Rice. The band and chorus was conducted by Mr. Cowen, the composer, who expressed himself highly gratified at the result. The second part of the programme was miscellaneous, including several songs by Mr. Cowen and

Mr. F. N. Löhr, the honorary Conductor of the Association, which were encored.

The members of the Bristol Post Office Band gave their second annual Concert, on the 16th ult., in Colston Hall, Bristol, when a large and appreciative audience was present. The vocalists were Miss Adeline Davis, Miss Eleanor Rees, Mr. Videon Harding, Mr. Lawford Huxtable; and the solo instrumentalists, Mr. Fred. Watts (violin), Mr. T. Pitcher (clarinet), Mr. C. Sandels (cornet), Mr. W. Ace (flute); grand organ, Mr. George Riseley.

Organ Recitals were given in Colston Hall by Mr. Riseley on the 3rd, 5th, and 12th ult.

The Salisbury Vocal Union gave its twentieth Concert in the Hamilton Hall on the 9th ult. The Concert opened with Romberg's Cantata, "The Lay of the Bell," which was excellently rendered by full band and chorus of eighty performers. The soloists were Madame Eva Scorg, Mr. Walter Clinch, Mr. Arthur Crick, and Mr. William Thomas. Miss Martin, Miss Harwood, and Mr. Prince assisted in the minor parts. The second part was a miscellaneous selection of songs, part-songs, and instrumental selections, all of which were well received. Miss W. Harwood presided at the piano-forte, and the Rev. H. W. Carpenter at the organ, and the band was efficient. Mr. Hayden conducted with his usual ability.

MUSIC IN OXFORD.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

THE chief musical events of the Term just closed have been the performance of Dr. H. J. Edwards's Oratorio, "The Ascension," already noticed in these columns, and the Concert of the newly-formed University Glee and Madrigal Society, in the Sheldonian Theatre, on the 10th ult. The Society was originated in Magdalen College, and a Conductor was found in Dr. Roberts, the Organist of that College. It did not take long to see that a great deal of good work had been done. The very first piece in the programme, Pearsall's part-song "Who shall win," evidenced the good quality of the singers, and proved that they were completely under the Conductor's control. The chief item in the programme was Wilbye's "Sweet honey-sucking bees," of which a very good performance was given; but a very large number of madrigals of sterling value were also sung, the best of which, as regards performance, were Benet's "Come, shepherds," and Walmisley's "Slow, slow, fresh fount." Variety was obtained by songs contributed by Miss Price and the Rev. H. E. Clayton and Rev. J. H. Lambert; and by glees, which gave the Academical Clerks of Magdalen an opportunity of showing how well they could sing. One of these, Webbe's "As the moments roll," was a really admirable performance. Taken all round, the Concert was remarkably successful, and the Society may be congratulated on having made such an excellent beginning.

MUSIC IN EDINBURGH.

(BY OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

THE Heckmann Quartet, encouraged by their hearty reception in Scotland, have given two more Chamber Concerts in the Queen Street Hall. The programme of the first, on the 2nd ult., included a Quartet by Von Rittersdorf, two movements from Brahms's Quartet in B major (Op. 67), and the Scherzo Presto from Beethoven's C sharp minor Quartet. At the second and farewell Concert, on the 3rd ult., a change was made by the introduction of the Kreutzer Sonata, for piano and violin, played by Herr Heckmann and Herr Beyschlag, and a Trio of Haydn's, in which Herr Beyschlag also sustained the piano part. Mr. A. B. Bach was the vocalist, and sang at each Concert Marschner's "Au jenem Tag" and songs by Franz, Mozart, Pergolesi, and Rossini.

Mr. W. A. Barrett, Vicar Choral of St. Paul's, gave a Lecture in the Literary Institute, on the subject of "Rural Ballads," on the 7th ult. He dwelt on the necessity of musicians saving what was left of songs that once were an important feature in the entertainments of the British rural population. The Lecture was varied by songs given in illustration of the subject, and was well attended.

An evening Concert, in aid of the Choir Fund of All Saints' Church, was given on the 8th ult. in St. George's Hall. The programme included Mendelssohn's Trio in D minor, and several of Schubert's songs. The principal vocalists were Miss Charters and Mr. Arthur Edmunds.

On the 9th ult. the Choral Union performed Mackenzie's "Rose of Sharon," of which a notice will be found in another column.

Mr. Francis Hueffer gave the first of a series of three Lectures on "Modern Music," on the 12th ult. He chose as his subject Richard Wagner, and gave a detailed sketch of the composer's life, dwelt upon the exquisite beauty of some of the melodies in his operas, and, without upholding Wagner as the ideal, pleaded his cause most warmly, and must have succeeded in bringing many to admire what they formerly failed to understand. The succeeding lectures will be on Liszt and Berlioz.

Herr Alfred Gallrein (violincellist) gave the second of his series of Chamber Concerts on the 15th ult. He was assisted by Herr Otto Schweizer (piano) and Mr. Colin Mackenzie (violin). The programme included Hummel's Trio (Op. 12), and as solo Herr Gallrein gave Boccherini's Second Sonata, arranged by Piatti; and, among other numbers, a Concert Mazurka by Fitzhagen, the performance of which was much appreciated. Mr. Mackenzie played Beethoven's Romance in F, and Herr Otto Schweizer gave Beethoven's Sonata Appassionata (Op. 57) and a Suite of his own (Op. 23), one movement of which is a prelude for the left hand only. Mdlle. Schow Rosing, from the Royal Opera House, Copenhagen, sang songs by Mendelssohn and Schubert, and a Bolero from Verdi's "Sicilian Vespers," which she gave with so much spirit that an encore was insisted upon.

At the second Choral Union Concert, on the 16th ult., Beethoven's Symphony in A, No. 7; Mendelssohn's Overture, "Midsummer Night's Dream"; Wagner's Overture "Tannhäuser"; Macfarren's "Festival" Overture; and Wieniawski's Concerto for violin and orchestra formed the programme. The violinist was M. Stanislaus Bercewicz, who was greatly applauded, and Mrs. Hutchinson was the vocalist. At the third Concert, on the 22nd ult., Haydn's Symphony, in E flat, No. 4, of the Rieter-Biedermann edition; Overture to "Oberon"; the Prelude to the third act of Wagner's "Meistersinger"; the Interlude from "Stanislaus" (Salve Polonia) by Liszt, were the principal orchestral numbers. Madame Anna Falk-Mehlig, as pianist, gave a vigorous interpretation of Rubinstein's D minor Concerto, and for her solos, pieces by Schumann, Chopin, and Liszt—of the latter, as an encore, the exquisitely rendered "Campanella." Mdlle. Schow Rosing, vocalist, was received with enthusiasm, she sang the Thule Ballad and Jewel scene from Gounod's "Faust," "Ave Maria" (Schubert), and a Danish song, "Laer Mig," by Hartmann. The Concerts were, as usual, conducted by Mr. Manns, and were well attended and much appreciated.

On the 18th ult. a performance of "Judas Maccabæus" was given in St. Giles's Cathedral by the St. Giles's Choral Society. The local performers were assisted by Mrs. Masson, Miss Emily Dones, Mr. Dyved Lewis, and Mr. Lucas Williams. The choruses were very fairly gone through, and did credit to the Conductor, Mr. J. O. Sinclair. Mr. John Hartley presided at the organ and greatly conducted to the success of the performance.

On the same evening Mr. John Kirkhope's choir performed Mendelssohn's "Elijah," which was repeated on the following afternoon, in aid of the local charities. The solos were sung by Mrs. Ellis, Miss Ross, Mr. Monro, and Mr. Wilson. The rendering, more especially the choral part, was admirable, evidencing the pains taken by the Conductor, Mr. John Kirkhope. There was a small orchestra, led by Mr. Daly. On both occasions the audience was large and appreciative.

MUSIC IN GLASGOW AND THE WEST OF SCOTLAND.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

OUR Choral Union series of Concerts had a most auspicious commencement on the 8th ult., when Mr. A. C. Mackenzie's Oratorio "The Rose of Sharon" was performed under the conductorship of the composer. I need not, however, enter into details of this performance or the repetition one on the Saturday evening following, as these Concerts, together with other interesting circumstances attending Mr. Mackenzie's presence here that week, are treated of at length elsewhere in this month's issue. I should like, however, to record what seems to be the very general feeling in regard to Mr. Mackenzie's music among our amateurs, namely, that no finer and more stable contribution than "The Rose of Sharon" has yet been added to the repertory of large choral works of its class by British or even Continental composers. The Glasgow Herald speaks in great praise of Mr. Mackenzie's Oratorio, but seems to think a weakness in it "lies (mainly) in the endeavour to extract from the subject a moral and religious significance which is not inherent in the story, the result being a certain confusion of styles, the apparent necessity for which has hampered the composer, compelling him at intervals to revert to stereotyped methods of contrapuntal writing, and in doing so preventing the full expression of his own individuality." I think, with all respect, that this is a wrong view altogether. I think the religious significance infused, even if after somewhat traditional methods, is the strength of the work rather than its weakness, and to Scotchmen very particularly will this religious treatment commend itself, accustomed as they are to associate the Song of Solomon with Christ and His Church, and to hear quotations from it specially applied at Communion seasons. It is the union of the strictly sacred style with the dramatic, together with its charming freshness and originality throughout, that will make the work acceptable here, and I should think everywhere else.

The first Orchestral Concert of the series took place on the 15th ult., under the conductorship of Mr. Manns, with most gratifying success. A magnificent performance was given of Beethoven's Symphony, No. 7, in A, the best in every way, I should think, that has ever been heard in Glasgow. While the Allegretto was rendered with great taste and feeling, the Presto or Scherzo and the Finale, allegro con brio, were played with much spirit and abandon, so to speak. What with the splendid tone from the violins, and the equally telling character of the other instruments, the audience was roused to the highest enthusiasm, and cheered Mr. Manns to the echo on the conclusion of the Symphony. An equally effective interpretation was given of the "Tannhäuser" Overture, the high executive ability of the whole stringed contingent, and the equally important fact of the superiority of their instruments, conducting, along with the satisfactory character of the brass, very specially in this number, to that result. Herr Stanislaus Bercewicz played the leading part in Wieniawski's Concerto, No. 2, in D minor, and two violin solos from Franz Ries's Adagio and Moto perpetuo, pleasing by his grace of style, and astonishing by his dexterity. A better or more equal violin than he played on would have been an improvement. Mrs. Hutchinson sang two solos, one of them Mr. Mackenzie's song, "What does little birdie say?"

At the Saturday Popular Concert immediately following, Beethoven's No. 5 Symphony in C minor was performed before a crowded audience. Herr Bercewicz played, and Mdlle. Elly Warnots was the vocalist.

We had a fortnightly series of Operatic performances by the Carl Rosa Opera Company during the last week of November and first week of December. They were given in the Grand Theatre, one of our largest houses, and excellently attended. The principal operas were "Manon," "Nadeshda," and "Mignon."

The Heckmann Quartet gave two Concerts on the 3rd and 5th ult., the latter at popular prices. I regret to say that the amount of support received was hardly such as to encourage a return visit, the taste for Chamber Music advancing but slowly among us, although it is decidedly making some way.

Mr. Francis Hueffer gave the first of a series of three Lectures on "Modern Music," in the Queen's Rooms, on the 9th ult., his subject being Richard Wagner. Mr. Hueffer had not a very large audience, but it was evidently a highly appreciative one. His next two Lectures take place on January 20 and February 17, his topic being respectively Franz Liszt and Hector Berlioz.

Mr. W. A. Barrett, Mus. Bac., gave a series of six Lectures during last month in Queen Margaret's College here, on the "Materials of Music," and delivered elsewhere in this district several others of his interesting and musically illustrated lectures on topics connected with the art.

I may record the promising début of Miss Helen McGregor, daughter of one of our Scotch painters, as a violinist, at a Concert given by Mr. J. R. W. Reid, in the St. Andrew's (Berkeley) Hall, on November 30. With the co-operation of Mr. Reid, Miss McGregor, who has been studying at Leipzig, also took part in Beethoven's Sonata in C minor (Op. 30, No. 2), for piano and violin.

A Concert by the Glasgow Select Choir, on the 5th ult., formed the last of the present series of Saturday Evening Ballad Concerts in St. Andrew's Hall. A new part-song in the Scotch style, by Sir George Macfarren, "Ye flow'ry banks o' bonnie Doon," words by Robert Burns, was given, and fairly well received; there were also sung a Jacobite song, "Bring the bowl," male voices, solo and chorus, and "The Border Raider," both by the late Rev. John Park, of St. Andrew's; but the most novel and decided departure from the usual lines of the choir, was the solo and chorus from Max Bruch's "Frithjof-Saga," "Sun in the sky." Mr. J. Miller Craig, in whose hands the reputation of the choir has by no means suffered, was the Conductor, and Mr. W. D. Swan the accompanist.

A Concert was given by the Blind Glee Party, on the 7th ult., in the Waterloo Rooms, at which was heard some excellent singing of glees and part-songs, the audience being greatly interested in and highly enjoying the performances.

The Partick Musical Association, now in its eighth year, gave a Concert in the Burgh Hall of that district town, on the 21st ult. There were about fifty voices. Gounod's Christmas anthem "O sing to God" (which appeared in the December number of THE MUSICAL TIMES) was in the programme, and proved very effective. Mendelssohn's motett "Grant us Thy peace" and Zingarelli's "Laudate" were among the other sacred selections. Bishop's glee "When wearied wretches" was the principal secular selection; the Concert judiciously not being an ambitious one at the beginning of the season. Mr. H. McNabb conducted, and Mr. G. W. Hopper acted as organist.

In Erskine United Presbyterian Church, on the same evening, the Church Choir, numbering about forty voices, gave a very excellent rendering of Dr. Stainer's "Daughter of Jairus." Mr. W. Mackinnon and Miss A. Stewart took the tenor and soprano solos. Mr. T. A. Ewing, organist of the church, conducted, and won much credit by the efficient state of his choir, as was seen also in some short sacred selections which followed the Cantata. Mr. J. Logie was the accompanist.

The Glasgow Amateur Orchestral Society gave its first Concert since its new organisation, and since it has been placed under the conductorship of Mr. W. T. Hoeck, in the Waterloo Rooms, on the evening of the 9th ult. There was a very large attendance and, generally speaking, though the Concert might with advantage have been postponed for a short time, the performances were very creditable to the members, among whom, it may be mentioned, are three lady violinists. Haydn's "Clock" Symphony, and the Overtures "Don Giovanni" (Mozart) and "Son and Stranger" (Mendelssohn) were the principal numbers in the programme.

The Hillhead Musical Association gave a Concert on the 17th ult. Gade's "Erl King's Daughter" was the chief item in the programme. Mr. W. T. Hoeck conducted. On the following evening the Crosshill Musical Association produced a new Cantata, by their Conductor, Mr. Alexander Patterson, the "book" of which is Thomas Campbell's ode "Hohenlinden." Mr. Patterson's treatment of the subject was somewhat elaborate, and on the whole successful, though it is cast on somewhat archaic lines. Mendelssohn's 13th Psalm was included in the programme of the choir of Queen's Park Established Church, on the 16th ult. The singing of this and the other numbers was marked by good taste. Mr. J. Fraser, organist of the Church, conducted. Gaul's Cantata "The Holy City" formed part of the programme of a Concert by the choir of Bath Street United Presbyterian Church, on the 17th ult., Mr. J. Turnbull conducting. "The Messiah" was performed at the City Hall on the 19th ult., the choruses being sung by the South Side Choral Society, under Mr. McKean.

The Oratorio "Judas Maccabæus" was performed by the Ayr Choral Union, on the 17th ult., Mr. Hugh McNabb conducting. The same work was produced during the week in Falkirk and Alloa by the Societies there.

OBITUARY.

THE death of Ludwig Nohl, which occurred suddenly, on the 18th ult., at Heidelberg, leaves a conspicuous void in the by no means over-crowded ranks of able contemporary writers concerning the historical aspects of musical art. His imaginative and versatile qualities of mind had been trained, philosophically, at the University of Bonn, and musically under the guidance of the late Friedrich Kiel, at Berlin. He subsequently became a private lecturer on musical history at the University of Heidelberg, where he eventually obtained a professorship, his lectures being always well attended. Nohl's chief influence upon the art-consciousness of the present generation, however, consisted in his numerous publications, both journalistic and in book form, wherein he upheld the standard of idealism and of healthy progress. There has been, indeed, much of an ephemeral nature from the prolific pen of this gifted and, as regards the modern development of our art, most competent writer. But whenever the final measure of his life's work shall be taken, his unceasing endeavours to communicate to a general public something of the enthusiasm he himself felt for the elevating and humanising influence of music will surely stand him in good stead. Among the more important literary productions of the deceased author may be instanced his "Life of Beethoven," his edition of the letters written by that master and by Mozart, and, amongst his later publications, a popular exposition of "The Modern Music Drama." Ludwig Nohl was also an occasional contributor to THE MUSICAL TIMES, his paper entitled "Beethoven's Tenth Symphony," more especially, having attracted general attention on account of its original research and the ingenuity of its combinations. He had scarcely, in human parlance, completed his career, having been born at Iserlohn (in Westphalia) in 1831, and thus only reached the age of fifty-four.

So much divergence of opinion exists as to the proper method of interpreting Handel's music, that more than usual interest attached to the Sacred Harmonic Society's performance of "The Messiah" on the 18th ult., as it was the first conducted by Mr. W. H. Cummings. Speaking generally, it was an excellent rendering of the Oratorio, the choruses having evidently received more careful preparation than is usual. Perhaps in time Mr. Cummings will see his way to purge the score of some of the un-Handelian accompaniments now in use. Meanwhile we should be grateful for the change in the method of accompanying the recitatives. The organ is preferable to the scrape of a violoncello, but a pianoforte would be better still. Miss Anna Williams, Miss Chester, Mr. Iver McKay, and Signor Foli were the principal vocalists.

THE thirty-ninth performance of the Musical Artists' Society took place on the 12th ult., at Willis's Rooms, when several interesting new compositions were included in the proceedings. Amongst the latter may be specially instanced a String Quartet in G minor, remarkable alike for melodiousness and musician-like workmanship, by Mr. Marshall Hall Bell, and a very effective Duo Brillante in E, by Mr. Charles E. Stephens. The execution of the quartet was in the efficient hands of Messrs. Wiener, Ellis Roberts, Alex. Wright, and B. Albert; the pianoforte duet being brilliantly rendered by Miss Emily Lawrence and Mr. Stephens. A pleasing song by the lady just named, entitled "The Truth of the Spirit," was one of the vocal contributions of the evening, and being rendered by so charming a singer as Miss Mary Davies, obtained the distinction of an encore. The performance, which was of an interesting character generally, did not, we may add, err on the side of over-prolongation, remarked upon by us on a previous occasion.

THE funeral of the late Rev. Benjamin Webb, for many years Vicar of St. Andrew's, Wells St., was made the occasion of a very impressive musical service, held in the Church on the 3rd ult. There was appropriateness in thus marking the solemn event, as St. Andrew's has long been celebrated for its cultivation of the higher forms of English Church Music, and the example it set in days of apathy and stagnation has been extensively followed. The anxiety to be present on the above occasion was widespread, and not only was the edifice crammed, but many were unable to obtain admission. The body rested in front of the altar rails and was surrounded with lighted candles, and as the chancel was filled with wreaths and crosses, mostly of white flowers, the spectacle was very striking. The opening sentences of Croft's beautiful service for the burial of the dead were sung in procession by the choir, and were followed by the "Dies Iræ" as set in the Hymnary (No. 107) by Dr. Stainer. Then came the Communion Service, intended especially for the mourners, part of the music being that used in the Greek Church. Mr. Docker, the Organist of St. Andrew's, presided at the organ.

WITH the alacrity distinguishing the management of the Tufnell Park Choral Society, the first performance in the Metropolis of Cowen's new Cantata, "Sleeping Beauty," was given at the St. George's Rooms on Tuesday evening, the 15th ult., with a measure of success that augured well for its general adoption by Societies limited in instrumental resources. A quintet of "strings," composed of the best known artists in their several departments, afforded sufficient extraneous aid to give form and feature to the beautiful orchestral themes; while the principal singers—Miss Eleanor Farnol, Miss Agnes Jansen, Mr. Charles Chilly, and Mr. Bridson—rendered the solo parts with remarkable efficiency; and as the indefatigable Conductor, Mr. W. Henry Thomas, had given his best attention to the training of the choir, a good all-round performance of the work was forthcoming. In the selection from Handel's "Samson" which preceded the Cantata, the choir had a wider opportunity for the display of its ability. Throughout the evening, Mr. Frank Lewis Thomas's assistance at the pianoforte was of signal service. The performance was, as usual, conducted by Mr. W. Henry Thomas.

THE Kyrle Choir, under the direction of Mr. Malcolm Lawson, has given the following performances:—"Elijah," on November 26, in Holy Trinity Church; soloists, Mrs. Stanley, Miss Barker, Mr. Frank Bell, and Mr. Pelham Roof; Mendelssohn's "Hear my prayer," selections from Mozart's "Requiem," and Spohr's "Last Judgment," on the 1st ult., in St. Clement's, Notting Hill; soloists, Mrs. Harrison, Miss Ethel Harrison, Miss Isabel Tomalin, Mr. John Probert, and Mr. Albert Orme; "The Messiah," on the 3rd ult., in St. Saviour's Church, Poplar; soloists, Miss Clara Hoschke, Miss Kaysel, Mr. Reginald Groome, and Mr. John Cross; and Mendelssohn's "Hear my prayer," the "Dies Iræ" from Mozart's "Requiem," and Spohr's "Last Judgment," on the 8th ult., in St. Peter's, Bethnal Green; soloists, Mrs. Harrison, Miss Ethel Harrison, Miss Clarke, Mr. Reginald Groome, and Mr. Albert Orme. Mr. E. H. Turpin accompanied at each performance.

THE members of the Grosvenor Choral Society held their 166th Monthly Concert, at the Grosvenor Hall, on Friday the 18th ult. The programme consisted of a miscellaneous selection, the solo vocalists being Miss Maud Cameron, Miss Rose Whittle, Mrs. Luff, Mr. Atherton Furlong, Mr. H. Davis, Mr. A. J. Reynolds, and Mr. A. Roach. The part music included compositions by Stevens, Marchetti, Bishop, Purcell, Farmer, Caldicott, &c. Mrs. T. P. Frame accompanied, and Mr. David Woodhouse conducted.

ON the 23rd ult., a Concert was given under the direction of Mr. Fitzhenry, at the Birkbeck Institution. The members of the violin classes played Intermezzo and March (B. Tours), Gavotte (Mignon), Moderato (Dancía), and "Serenade de Mandolines" (Desormes), with good effect. Mr. J. Beare was much applauded for his flute solo, "Robert, toi qui j'aime," and the vocalists, Miss Mary Beare, Mr. E. Bryant, Mr. Stanley Smith, and Mr. Kift, were all much appreciated. Mr. H. S. Webster was the accompanist.

A CONCERT was given in the Kensington Town Hall, on the 9th ult., by Mr. H. Martyn van Lennep, chiefly for the purpose of bringing to a public hearing specimens of his compositions for the voice and for pianoforte. Some of these had hardly a fair chance in the hands of their interpreters, but with all deductions for faults in performance, these compositions do not appear to rise above the level of ordinary drawing-room songs. The harmonies are marked by constant and infelicitous mannerisms, while frequent changes of tempo and rhythm destroy the sense of unity in the writing. Exception, however, must be made in favour of "Whither?" well sung by Mr. Atherton Furlong, whose pleasant voice and good taste gave full effect to a song which has a real lyrical touch in it. Mr. van Lennep's pianoforte music is of much the same stamp as his compositions for the voice, save that the slight promise afforded by the latter is here less apparent.

THE Annual Concerts at the Whitgift Grammar School, Croydon, were given on Wednesday and Friday evenings, the 16th and 18th ult. The first part was devoted to Callcott's Cantata, "The Golden Harvest." The orchestra consisted of twenty-eight members of the Whitgift Musical Society, complete in wind and string, with pianoforte and American organ. The choir, sixty-four boys (trebles and altos), and eighteen men, was conducted by Mr. E. Griffith, F.C.O., the music master. The second part of the programme included the first movement of Symphony, No. 5, in D (Mozart), and Overture "Don Giovanni," both admirably rendered, as were also two new compositions of the Conductor—(1) "The Builders" (Longfellow's poem), for chorus and full band; (2) "Holiday March," for six violins, piano and organ. At the close of the Friday Concert, the Head Master thanked Mr. Griffith for so successful a Concert.

THE following competitions in connection with the Royal Academy of Music took place at the Institution on Monday, the 21st ult.: the Hine Gift for the best English ballad, by students of the Academy under seventeen years of age—Examiners: Messrs. Cotsford Dick, A. J. Caldicott, Mus. Doc., Cantab., and M. Maybrick (Chairman). There were eight candidates, and the gift was awarded to Mabel Lyons. The Balfe Scholarship—Examiners: Messrs. H. C. Banister, F. W. Davenport, H. C. Lunn, and the Principal (Chairman). There were seven candidates, and the Scholarship was awarded to Tom Frewin. The Potter Exhibition—Examiners: Messrs. H. C. Banister, O. Beringer, F. B. Jewson, S. Kemp, H. C. Lunn, and the Principal (Chairman). There were five candidates, and the Exhibition was awarded to Chas. S. Macpherson.

ON Wednesday afternoon, the 2nd ult., a Cantata entitled "Esther," composed as an exercise for the degree of Doctor in Music by Mr. Harry Coy, Mus. Bac., Oxon., was performed with marked success at the Sheldonian Theatre, Oxford. The chief events in the story of the beautiful Jewish maiden who displaced Vashti in the reign of King Ahasuerus, and saved her people from slaughter, were ably recited by Mr. Wright (tenor), and Esther was represented by Master Glenton, of whose solos the most admired was "My soul doth magnify the Lord," with a charming accompanying chorus. The other soloists were Messrs. Bailey, Grice, Phillips, Robson, Crane, and Bonell. The trebles of the chorus were New College choir boys, who did credit to the training of Mr. J. Taylor, Mus. Bac. The Organist was Mr. Dodds, Mus. Bac.

THE Members of the East Finchley Choral Society gave their first Concert of the fourth season at the Lecture Hall, on Thursday, the 3rd ult. Rossini's "Stabat Mater" occupied the first part of the programme. Mr. Greenslade conducted. The soloists were Mlle. Marie Vagnolini, Miss Pauline Featherby, Mr. Richard Evans, and Mr. Egbert Roberts. Miss Jones presided at the pianoforte, and Mr. Edwin Drewett, A.C.O., at the harmonium. The second part was miscellaneous.

A RECITAL of Sacred Music was given at St. Philip's Church, Clerkenwell, on the 14th ult., the principal feature in the programme being Schumann's "Advent Hymn," which was accompanied by the organ and an orchestra of strings. The vocalists were Miss Rhoda Fryer, and Mr. Conrad Farnes; Organist, Mr. D. E. Ayling; Conductor, Mr. J. M. Ennis, L.Mus., T.C.L.

THAT excellent body of artists, the Heckmann Quartet, appeared for the second time in South London at the Denmark Hill Concert, given at the Surrey Masonic Hall, Camberwell, on Thursday evening, the 17th ult. The concerted music consisted of Schumann's Quartet (Op. 47, No. 3) and Beethoven's Quartet in A (Op. 18, No. 5), the executants being Messrs. Heckmann, Forberg, Alkotte, and Bellmann. Both works were admirably played. One of the most interesting features in the programme was the remarkably clever pianoforte playing of Miss Fanny Davies, whose rendering of the Prelude in A flat (Chopin); Characteristic Piece in E (Mendelssohn); and Gigue in B flat minor (Graun), won enthusiastic applause. Miss Liza Lehmann and Madame Danis-Boëté were the vocalists.

A PERFORMANCE of Mr. Cowen's Cantata, "Sleeping Beauty," was given on the 14th ult. at Barnsbury Hall, under the direction of Mrs. Lucas, of Colebrooke House School, Islington, in which the young ladies of that establishment formed part of a very efficient choir, supported instrumentally by a small stringed band and the pianoforte. The solos were given by Misses Fanny Moody and A. Fletcher, Messrs. A. Smith and T. J. Grylls; Miss Moody more especially initiating herself into the favour of her hearers by her admirable rendering of the music allotted to the Princess. The hall was well filled with an audience who evidently fully appreciated the spirited efforts of the lady Conductor in introducing thus early Mr. Cowen's graceful and melodious new work to the amateurs of the above district.

A HIGHLY successful Concert was given at the Mansion House by the students' orchestra, in connection with the Guildhall School of Music, on Saturday, the 12th ult. The performers were mostly very young in years, but the programme was extremely ambitious, the leading items being the first movement of Schubert's B minor Symphony and the "Leonora" and "Tannhäuser" overtures. These were rendered with much spirit and striking unity of style, testifying to the excellent training of Mr. Weist Hill. Several pupils of the School appeared as soloists, the most successful being Miss Kate Honey (Lady Jenkinson prizeholder) in the first movement of Beethoven's Piano Concerto in E flat, and Miss Florence Richmond in Weber's "Softly Sighs."

THE annual Concert of the Violin Classes at the South London Institute of Music, under the direction of Mr. Fitzhenry, took place on the 8th ult. The chief feature was, of course, the performance by seventy members of the classes, who rendered in excellent style, and with good effect, Intermezzo and March (B. Tours), Favourite National Airs (S. Jarvis), and Gavotte, "Mignon" (A. Thomas). Mr. T. E. Gatehouse was encored in both his violin solos, Adagio and Rondo, from Rode's Concerto in A minor and De Beriot's "Air varié"; and a Gavotte by Scotson Clark was well played by eight of his pupils. The vocalists were Miss Ethel Winn, Miss Mary Waite, Mr. E. Hall, and Mr. Stanley Smith; Mr. W. H. Harper officiating as accompanist.

THE 202nd Consecutive Monthly Concert of the St. George's Glee Union took place, on the 4th ult., at the Picnic Rooms, Warwick Street, S.W. The part-songs included compositions by Callcott, Samuel Webbe, Hullah, Sir H. R. Bishop, Dr. Cooke, Mornington, and Garrett, and, with one or two exceptions, were well sung by the choir, under Mr. Joseph Monday's direction. Miss Kate Fusselle, Miss Clara Myers, Mr. Holberry Hagyard, Mr. Alfred Grieve, and Mr. R. F. Roberts were the soloists. A Violin Solo was well played by Master Corelli Windatt, and Mr. F. R. Kinkead, in addition to his able accompanying, gave a masterly rendering of "Cascade" (Pauer) on the pianoforte.

MR. STEDMAN has been engaged as Director of the Music at the Church of All Saints, Norfolk Square, Paddington, W. Commencing with the first Sunday in the new year, the Service will be Matins, at 11 o'clock; Evensong, at 4. The choir will consist of Mr. Stedman's choir boys, and will also include Messrs. Wyburn, Carlyle, Jay, Bantock Pierpoint, and J. T. Hutchinson. The Organist will be Mr. Augustus Toop.

THE first Invitation Concert of the St. John's Choral Society was given in the new Church-room attached to St. John's Church, Deptford, on the 11th ult., when the building was well filled. The ability of the Society was not overtaken in the selection of Bennett's "Woman of Samaria." The choir was surprisingly effective, considering the short time which has elapsed since the formation of the Society. Miss Simson, Miss Hogg, Mr. E. Harris, and Mr. W. Kenneth Britton were the soloists, Mr. F. A. Bridge (the Conductor), and Mr. Herbert J. Smith (the pianist) are to be greatly complimented upon the gratifying results of the performance. The latter portion of the programme was miscellaneous.

AN excellent Ballad and Instrumental Concert was given by Mr. F. H. Horscroft at Brixton Hall, on Tuesday evening, the 15th ult. The bénéficiaire obtained a warm and well-deserved reception for each of his solos, O. Barri's new song "The valley of shadows," and Pinsuti's "The life-boat." The remaining contributors were Madame Adeline Paget, Miss Josephine Turner, Madame Raymond, Mr. H. Taylor, Mr. Dalgetty Henderson, Mr. Franklin Clive, Miss Alice Aloof (pianoforte), Mr. Bernhard Carrodus (violin), Mr. Howard Reynolds (cornet), Mr. J. H. Young (piccolo), Mr. Henry Roe (concertina), and Mr. F. Lowden (organ). Mr. Turle Lee accompanied.

It is with much regret that we record the death of Miss Elizabeth Philp, which took place at her residence in Gloucester Road, Regent's Park, on November 26. As a writer of refined and tuneful songs, especially of the ballad type, Miss Philp had attained great and well-deserved popularity; but she was also well known and highly esteemed as a teacher of singing. She had studied under Garcia, Marchesi, and Ferdinand Hiller, and her public Concerts and private musical gatherings were always well attended. To her artistic qualifications, she united a kind and genial nature, and her loss will be deeply felt by the numerous friends she had attracted around her.

MRS. A. J. LAYTON, F.C.O., gave a very successful Concert on Thursday, the 10th ult., at the Onslow Hall, South Kensington, under distinguished patronage, at which Pergolesi's "Stabat Mater" was sung for the second time by her ladies' choral class, accompanied by a small string orchestra. The second part of the programme included Beethoven's "Choral Fantasia" (pianoforte, Mrs. Layton), Mendelssohn's "Why rage fiercely the heathen," and other works. Solos were given by Miss Beata Francis, Miss Annie Layton, Mr. A. Montague Shepherd, and Mr. Alfred J. Layton. Mr. H. A. Evans and Mrs. Layton were the Conductors.

A CONCERT was given by the Choral Society in connection with the Surrey Conservatoire of Music, on the 8th ult., at Brixton Hall. The programme consisted of "The Hymn of Praise" (Mendelssohn); "Rock of Ages" (J. F. Bridge); and "Yule Tide" (T. Anderton). The soloists were Miss Marianne Fenna, Miss Thompson (a pupil of the S.C.M.), Mr. Joseph Tapley, and Mr. Henry Blower, all of whom were thoroughly efficient. The choruses were well sung, under the conductorship of Mr. Colman. Mr. Sewell, A.R.A.M., officiated at the pianoforte, and, alternately with Mr. Attwater, A.C.O., at the organ.

ON the 17th ult., the All Saints' (Clapton) Musical Society gave an Evening Concert in the Schools, Blurton Road, when Van Bree's "St. Cecilia's Day," and Forsey Brion's "Marathon" were performed. The principal vocalists were Miss Julia Jones, Messrs. J. R. Hodgson and C. G. G. Ablitt; Conductor, Mr. W. M. Wait (Organist and Choirmaster of All Saints'). Miss Emily King (pupil of Mr. Wait) accompanied. The choruses were given with great precision, and Miss Julia Jones was warmly applauded for her singing of the soprano music in each Cantata.

THE Finsbury Choral Association, at the first Concert of the present season, at the Holloway Hall, on the 3rd ult., gave a performance of Handel's "Judas," with orchestral accompaniments, the band, under the leadership of Mr. Carrodus, including several well-known performers. The principal vocalists were Madame Clara West, Miss Edith Marriott, Madame Marian McKenzie, Mr. Holberry Hagyard, and Mr. Hilton; Conductor, Mr. C. J. Dale.

THE Bohemian Musical Society, organised last year by Messrs. Alfred Moore and J. Dalgetty Henderson, gave the fourth Smoking Concert of the present series in the Marble Hall of the Crystal Palace, on Thursday evening, the 17th ult. Mr. Henshaw Russell, the Palace manager, occupying the chair. The vocalists were Messrs. Moore, Henderson, T. Powell, Sackville Evans, and Master Humm; the instrumentalists being Mr. T. E. Gatehouse (violin), Mr. Marten (viola), Mr. Condy (cello), Mr. Miles (harp), with Mr. J. Haydn Parry at the pianoforte.

AN Organ Recital was given in the Parish Church, Hackney, on the 8th ult., by the Organist of the church, Mr. Arthur Trickett, F.C.O. The programme, which received artistic treatment, comprised—Allegro Maestoso (Smart), Andante in A major (Wesley), Fantasia and Fugue in G minor (Bach)—(miscalled in programme Prelude and Fugue)—Adagio (Mendelssohn), Invocation (Guilmant), Melody (Salomé), Fanfare (Lemmings), and Offertoire in F (Wély).

MR. F. A. W. DOCKER gave an Organ Recital at Christ Church, North Finchley, on the 10th ult. There was a short Choral Service, after which an interesting programme comprising compositions by Beethoven, Batiste, Tours, Wély, Salomé, and a Selection from Gounod's new work, "Mors et Vita," was excellently rendered by Mr. Docker. The vocalists were Miss May Cartwright, Messrs. C. and J. C. Thompson, and Master W. Lawrence.

A SUCCESSFUL Concert by the students of the Highbury and Islington Academy, took place at the Highbury Athenæum on Friday, the 18th ult. The programme, which was miscellaneous, concluded with selections from Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise." Every item was well rendered, and reflected the greatest credit on Miss Berrie Stephens, the Principal of the Academy, who also deserves a word of praise for her able conducting.

MISS ANNIE BUTTERWORTH, who died at Hendon, on the 9th ult., was an excellent contralto singer, and when very young, won the Westmorland Scholarship for vocalists at the Royal Academy of Music. She also carried off the Christine Nilsson prize at the same institution, and was the successful candidate at the last National Competition at the Crystal Palace.

THE Harvest Home Festival at the Cathedral of the Incarnation, Garden City, Long Island, was in every respect a genuine success. The singing of the choir (which was surprised) reflected the utmost credit upon the Choirmaster and Organist, Mr. W. H. Woodcock. The soloists were Masters Fred Gavey and Clagett, Messrs. M. F. P. Holgate and E. Campbell.

A CONCERT under Mr. Ernest A. Williams's direction was given at Neumeyer Hall, on the 19th ult., when several very promising débütantes were introduced. The professional artists were Miss Marie Gane, Miss Jeannie Rosse, Mr. E. A. Williams, and Mr. A. G. Pritchard.

AT a congregation holden at Oxford, on the 3rd ult., presided over by the Vice-Chancellor, Mr. H. Coy, Mus. Bac., of New College, and Sale, near Manchester, who was presented by Sir Frederick Ouseley, received the degree of Doctor in Music.

THE clergy, churchwardens, and choir of All Saints' Church, South Acton, have recently presented Mr. Thomas Curry, the Organist and Choirmaster, with a very handsome case of electro silver, to mark the occasion of his marriage.

MONS. GUILMANT met with a splendid reception at the Bow and Bromley Institute on the 12th ult., and Mr. Ernest Birch, a young and promising baritone, was highly successful in his vocal selections, receiving several encores.

MR. F. MARSHALL WARD has been appointed Conductor to the Nottingham Philharmonic Choir. This Choir gained the first prize at the competition at the Inventions Exhibition held in September last.

THE Civil Service Vocal Union's first Smoking Concert of the season took place in the large hall at Cannon Street Hotel, on the 3rd ult. Mr. J. H. Maunder conducted.

THE name of T. Flemmings, which appeared in the list of those admitted to the degree of Mus. Doc., at Oxford, in our last number, should have been T. Hemmings.

REVIEWS.

Le Cid. Opéra en 4 Actes et 10 Tableaux, d'après Guillemin de Castro et Cornille. Poème de MM. D'Ennery, Callet, et Blau; Musique de J. Massenet. [Paris: G. Hartmann.]

OUR readers will be interested in some particulars regarding the work by M. Massenet so successfully produced at the Grand Opéra on November 30. These we now propose to give, and, first, as to the story and its dramatic telling:—

ACT I. The scene is an apartment in the house of the Count de Gormas at Burgos, where are gathered the master of the mansion and his friends. We hear sounds of music without, and learn that the King is about to bestow knighthood upon a young warrior—Don Rodrigue. There is some talk of a further honour—Governor of the Infant—but the Count's friends indicate him as the likely recipient. Presently Chimène, the Count's daughter, enters, and it soon appears that, with her father's approval, she loves Don Rodrigue. Some doubt, however, regarding the Infante mars her joy till she learns from the royal lady's own lips that she is not at liberty to obey the dictates of her heart. The way now seems clear, and the first tableau ends happily for the course of true love. When the scene has changed to a gallery leading from the palace to the cathedral, we are called upon to witness the pompous ceremonial of Don Rodrigue's knighthood. This over, the King proceeds to appoint as Governor to his son, not the Count de Gormas, but Don Diègue, the father of Rodrigue. Here is the beginning of trouble. The Count and his partisans are furious, and when the King has left the stage, they proceed to insult Don Diègue, although that personage amicably proposes the union of Rodrigue and Chimène. From words the parties come to blows. Don Diègue is buffeted, disarmed, mocked, and left alone in his disgrace. The old man then bethinks him of his son. He shall avenge the wrong, and Don Rodrigue is ready enough to do it until he learns that the offender is Chimène's father, while his distress becomes the more intense as he overhears the maiden repeating words of love for himself. But family pride and filial duty prevail. Don Diègue shall have his revenge. Upon this sinister position the curtain falls.

ACT II. A street in Burgos at night. Don Rodrigue meets the Count. They fight, and the young man's sword pierces the heart of his father's insulter. A crowd gathers round, Don Diègue enters and joyfully embraces his son, while the body is carried to the palace. Presently, Chimène appears on the balcony, demanding the murderer's name, and swearing by her father's blood that she will punish him with her own hand. There is no answer save the mournful notes of a "Requiem." Again the girl puts her question, but all stand mute. Then she addresses several of the bystanders personally, till the turn of Rodrigue comes. Seeing him pale and agitated she divines the truth, and falls senseless to the ground. We are next shown an open space before the palace on the occasion of a popular fête, which, of course, entails the inevitable ballet. While the King and Court are assisting in the ceremonials, Chimène enters, wildly demanding justice upon Rodrigue, in which she is supported by the popular voice. The offender and his father shortly appear, and a long, exciting scene takes place, some ranging themselves on one side, and some on the other. Suddenly a trumpet is heard, and an envoy from the Moorish chieftain, Boabdil, enters with a declaration of war. The King accepts the issue, and reproaches Don Rodrigue with having put hors de combat his best general. Equal to the occasion, Don Diègue suggests that Rodrigue himself should head the troops; the crowd accept the idea with enthusiasm; the King consents, and Don Rodrigue, a minute before in danger of his life, is now the acclaimed leader of the Spanish army. Chimène and her wrongs are out of court.

ACT III. Chimène, in her chamber, laments the misery and despair that have come upon her. Unexpectedly, Rodrigue enters. The scene that follows may be imagined. Notwithstanding the barrier that has risen between them, they recall their mutual affection, and there is much play of conflicting feeling; Chimène pardoning her lover one moment and recalling her words the next. Rodrigue, however, sees good cause for departing to the war as one who will ultimately win a double victory. The scene now changes to the Spanish camp, where the soldiers are engaged in picturesque but untimely revels, for, as their leader informs them, the Moors are near with an immense army. Rodrigue is next seen in his tent. He despairs of his fate till St. James appears to him, and a celestial chorus hails him victor in the coming strife. The heavenly prediction is fulfilled.

ACT IV. A room in the palace of Granada. Certain deserters from Rodrigue's army have brought news of his death, and not only his father, but Chimène is overwhelmed with grief. Her love now breaks all barriers, and she confesses herself bound to Don Rodrigue's memory. Upon this sad scene bursts the joy of the King and the city, Rodrigue is not dead, but has come back a conqueror. The rest can be imagined.

Words of ours are scarcely needed to show how skillfully the authors of the poem have dealt with their material so as to produce spectacular effects and powerful dramatic situations. The interest of the story is well sustained in many ways; its issue is kept clearly before the mind, and close attention is relieved by brilliant stage displays. Moreover, the two principal characters have a psychological importance. Both are the subjects of strife between love and duty, but it is the woman who forgets and forgives. With the man honour prevails, with the woman affection is master, and both are true to nature.

Turning to the music, we find the opera treated in the now general fashion which makes each scene an undivided whole. Except in so far as this has become "form," the composer observes nothing formal. He holds himself at perfect liberty to deal with the text in any way best suited to its dramatic and musical expression. This, however, does not operate to the exclusion of long solos, duets, and concerted pieces, which are links between the old style and the new. The Overture, made up of themes from the body of the work, is generally more important than usual, and in the first act there are several conspicuous examples of M. Massenet's musical skill and dramatic feeling. Among these we place the short duet for Chimène and her father, in which the Count divines and approves his daughter's love. The melody here is full of grace and feeling. So, too, in the duet for Chimène and the Infante, where, as a long, sustained theme for the orchestra attracts instant attention. This theme, like others in the opera, has a representative significance, but the device is not pushed to an objectionable extreme. On other grounds the duet is likely to become a favourite number. The ceremonial music at the opening of the second tableau is much to the point—vigorous and picturesque enough for the taste of a Meyerbeer, while the theme to which Rodrigue enters has a peculiar nobility and elegance. In the new knight's invocation of his sword, "O noble lame étincelante," great breadth of style is shown. The phrases are bold and soldierly; they are used both in song and ensemble with good judgment, and help to the attainment of a veritable climax. Passing over the quarrel scene between the two lords with a word for the general propriety of its musical setting, we come to the passionate and distressful soliloquy of the insulted Don Diègue, and the dialogue of father and son. Here the composer appears to distinct advantage, although the situation is by no means an easy one. We have nothing like Donna Anna's air in "Don Giovanni," or that of Leonora in "Fidelio," but the music, while of a different character and less consistent, aptly falls in with the indignation of the text. The dialogue is finely dramatic.

In Act II. an important soliloquy for Rodrigue, "Percé jusques au fond du cœur," starts well, but is more declamatory than melodic, while in the duet scene we have a reflection of the style and character shown in the preceding quarrel. A higher level is reached when Chimène calls upon the slayer of her father to reveal himself. At this point the melody of the first duet is happily introduced as suggesting the kindness and love of the dead sire; effective, too, is the contrast between the passionate exclamations of Chimène and the solemn phrases of the "Requiem," which, from time to time, break in upon them. The fête music in the next tableau need not long detain us. M. Massenet, an adept in dealing with situations of the kind, is here bright, animated, and vigorous to the last degree. The ballet movements are quite charming, and will often be heard apart from the opera for the sake of their attractive Spanish character. Following the entrance of Chimène and her demand for justice comes a most imposing ensemble, wrought up to the highest expression of conflicting passions. M. Massenet deals with it in a manner characteristically French—that is to say, with great breadth and force of outline, rather than variety of detail. But the effect cannot be denied, any more than the steadiness with which it is maintained through the whole of the Finale which sees Don Rodrigue appointed leader of the army. Upon the whole of this Act, indeed, M. Massenet may be complimented. It is a great effort of its kind, and a successful one.

A marked contrast comes with the opening of Act III., and Chimène's despairing monologue. Touching melody abounds here, and the true notes of varied feeling are continually heard, as, also, in the important duet which follows for the heroine and her lover. Upon this duet, with its deep emotion and pathetic beauty, the memory of those who have heard it loves to dwell. In some respects it is the finest thing in the work, and bears comparison with the most famous examples of its kind, not excepting the equally long and passionate one in the fourth Act of "Les Huguenots." M. Massenet, always easily picturesque, is happy in the camp scene with its Moorish dances, and charmingly effective in that of the Vision, where his melodic power asserts itself to good purpose.

In the last Act we have the highly contrasted duet of Chimène and Don Diègue, each sorrowing for the supposed dead hero, and the joyous pageant music which welcomes the conqueror, and expresses all the feeling of a happy dénouement. Upon this we need not dwell further than to say that the opera sustains its musical interest to the end. A true climax is reached as Chimène is called upon publicly to say whether she accepts Rodrigue, although the slayer of her father. An exciting situation, cleverly treated, thus precedes the final descent of the curtain.

We have noticed the opera in merest outline, not caring to anticipate the careful review it must receive after its English performance. Our object has been to excite interest in, and expectation of, a remarkable work.

Novello, Ewer and Co.'s Music Primers. Edited by Dr. Stainer. Solfeggi. By Florence A. Marshall. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

IN order to place our readers in possession of the real intention of the authoress in producing this work, we cannot do better than quote from her ably written Preface the following remarks upon the character of the Seventy Solfeggi presented in the furtherance of her plan. "Although composed for a sight-singing class, they are not, themselves, intended to teach sight-singing. Although illustrating various technical facts in music, they do not profess to instil any of these, except indirectly. Although affording practice to the vocal powers similar in kind, if not in degree, to that of ordinary Solfeggi for solo singers, they are not essentially exercises in vocalisation. I would have them bear the same relation to technical sight-singing that a country walk does to an object-lesson. They are little music-pictures, adapted for the voice or for voices; recreation-exercises for all the musical powers, uttered in song." In connection with this explanation of the Solfeggi, should also be read the Chapter—Essay indeed, it might be called—upon the "Moveable Do, and Tonic Sol-fa," the opinions therein expressed amply justifying the use of Sol-fa syllables, which are placed under each note of the Solfeggi, although the ordinary notation on the five-line staff is adhered to. Some useful hints, too, may be taken to heart by musical reformers in the remarks upon the method of using the Solfeggi. For instance, the authoress tells us—"Whenever the key changes, the name of the new key is given in the Staff Notation, as of course it always is in Sol-fa. I do not know why this should not be commonly done in elementary music, or in single vocal or instrumental parts. It would be a great help to clearness and swiftness of comprehension." Undoubtedly it would;

but the conservative feeling which rules our present notation, and which the Tonic Sol-faists are attempting to battle with, would speedily frustrate any attempt in this direction—even the old verbal indications of whether the key is major or minor being now abolished, by common consent. Bearing in mind the avowed design of the composer in writing the Solfeggi contained in this volume, we have nothing but unqualified praise for them, not only as Exercises for class-singers, but as refined and graceful little Sketches thoroughly worthy of being sung to words instead of syllables: indeed in such charmingly melodious pieces as "A Song of yesterday," "Evening Song," "Forest Echoes," and the "Siciliana," little vocalists will find it difficult to avoid supplying some (perhaps nursery) lines to the highly suggestive notes they are singing. We may say that, apart from their intrinsic attraction as musical pieces, many are specially illustrative of intervals—as, for instance, seconds, thirds, fourths, the diminished fifth, and augmented fourth; others of chords, as the common chord, dominant seventh, and diminished seventh; and many of a distinct class of composition, as the Waltz, Minuet, Polacca, Galop, and Canon. Some are unaccompanied, and others have a simple pianoforte part, always appropriate, and always easy to play. That the work must become extensively known is beyond a doubt; and when we affirm as we do with the utmost confidence, that Mrs. Marshall has done for young vocalists what Schumann has so successfully effected for young pianists, there is equal certainty that it will become as extensively appreciated.

THE object which the author of this brochure has at heart is the regeneration of the viola or, as this instrument is still somewhat misleadingly called in this country, the tenor (French, Lalto; Italian, viola di Braccio). When, to adopt the language of modern physiology, the great "struggle for existence" took place during the first half of the past century, amongst the instruments of most various calibre and capacity belonging to the violin family, the question was eventually set at rest by the definite institution, during Haydn's earlier time, of the present orchestral string quartet. The component parts of the latter in its fundamental dimensions—viz., violin, viola, violoncello, and violono, or Double-Bass, were selected as corresponding most nearly to the main divisions of the human voice, and this principle of analogy was likewise extended to the remaining groups of instruments constituting the modern orchestral body. Now it is Herr Ritter's contention that the law governing the "survival of the fittest" has been at fault as regards the selection of the instrument intended (as he maintains, and we think rightly) to represent the contralto voice among its stringed associates—i.e., the viola; or, at any rate, that the instrument bearing that name has greatly degenerated since the time of its permanent adoption in modern instrumental combinations. "Its veiled and dull tone, together with a certain 'nasal' timbre," the author contends, "albeit dear to some of its advocates, render the existing viola an unworthy representative of its vocal prototype, the characteristic qualities of which are rich mellowness, sonority and flexibility." Thus it has no claim to the occasional distinction of a solo instrument, nor does it consequently offer much encouragement for its special study, it being a notorious fact that most of its professors in our orchestras are taken from the ranks of second and third rate violin players, to the detriment of the few characteristic qualities which may be said to distinguish the instrument in question. These and other considerations, put forward with much clearness and logical force in the above pamphlet, have occupied the attention of Herr Ritter for a long time past, and have led to the construction some years ago, under his supervision, of a viola with which his name has since become associated, and which, from its superior claims to represent among stringed instruments the human contralto, he calls the "viola alta." This instrument, although tuned the same as the one it is intended to replace (i.e., a major fifth below the violin) is more powerfully constructed, Herr Ritter having been guided in his task by the ingenious "Geometrical Rules for Violin makers" laid down in 1786 by Antonio

Bagatella, of Padua, and whereof a translation is here appended. While requiring a study distinct from the violin, the "viola alta" will reward the more advanced player by its grand and sympathetic tone which raises it to the rank of a solo instrument, it being more especially adapted for the execution of cantabile passages and for portamento singing generally. So at least the author assures us, pointing, in confirmation, to some of his enthusiastic pupils, and more emphatically still to a letter addressed to him in March, 1876, by Richard Wagner, wherein the master expresses his warm approval of the "viola alta" and only regrets that for the want of experienced players on the instrument, he could not there and then introduce it into the Bayreuth "Nibelungen" orchestra. There can be no doubt that Herr Ritter's regenerated viola deserves the attention of musicians. He will experience no little difficulty probably in securing its general adoption; for orchestral conductors as a rule are a conservative race, and it will be more especially to influential composers themselves that he will have to look for aid in this direction. Herr Ritter, we may add, is just now visiting this country for the purpose of introducing his instrument to English audiences.

The Professional Pocket Book and Daily and Hourly Engagement Diary for 1886. [Rudall, Carte and Co.]

THE announcement on the title-page of the present issue of this work that it is "Published according to the plan of the late Sir Julius Benedict," proves that any modification of the original design suggested by press notices is not considered desirable. We have only, therefore, to repeat our generally favourable verdict upon the book, and to express a hope that at some future time in the events of the year the records of Races may give place to those of more importance to the "Professional" man, for whom the Pocket Book is avowedly intended.

O pray for the peace of Jerusalem. Surge, illuminae. Composed by Gerard F. Cobb.

[London Music Publishing Company.]

MR. COBB'S compositions have always the impress of cultured musicianly feeling, and though the present are but trifles, they are distinguished by refinement and good taste. The first-named is an anthem in three movements for male voices (alto, tenor, and two basses). The other is a setting in Latin of Isaiah Lx., verses 1-3, for mixed voices. It is a pity that the English text is not also given, for it would make a charming little anthem for Christmas. Both works are intended for voices unaccompanied, but an organ part may be added at discretion.

Marche Romaine, for Piano. By Edward Redhead. [Wood and Co.]

A bold and effective March, which calls for but little criticism. The subjects, however, have scarcely any special national character.

FOREIGN NOTES.

THE first performance of M. Massenet's new opera "Le Cid" (a detailed account whereof appears in another column) took place on November 30 last, at the Paris Grand Opéra, with much éclat, and French journals are full of praise, both as regards the merits of the libretto and of the music wedded thereto. Special commendation is accorded to the composer in some quarters for having, in the present instance, apparently freed himself from the influence of Wagner's theories which some of his former works betray, or as M. Arthur Pougin, in Le Ménestrel, puts it—"de ne s'être pas complu dans les théories nébuleuses des abstractions de quintessences Wagnériennes." The adventures of the Spanish national hero, we may add, have been frequently treated before as a subject for opera under the various titles of "Il Cid," "Chimène," and "Rodrigo;" Handel's Italian Opera of the latter name being, perhaps, the most notable example, from an antiquarian point of view—the only point of view, in fact, from which the operatic productions in question (although some of them are of comparatively recent date) may now be regarded. Let us trust that M. Massenet's new work will escape a similar fate, and that—to improve upon M. Pougin's pleasant adaptation of the words of Boileau—not only

"tout Paris," but "tout le monde pour le Cid ait les yeux de Chimène."

While the "théories Wagnériennes," whereof we have just had so characteristic a definition, are still being semi-officially disavowed, and the music-dramas of their author practically prohibited in France, on "patriotic" grounds, the productions of modern French composers meet with no similar prejudice in the country of the Bayreuth reformer. We refer more especially to the recent first performance at Cologne of M. Victorien Joncières's Opera "Le Chevalier Jean" ("Johann von Lothringen," in the German version), which met with a most enthusiastic reception at the hands of a densely crowded audience. The composer himself was present on the occasion, and had, it is said, every reason to be satisfied with the manner in which his work had been put on the stage. The excellent tenor, Herr Götze, materially contributed to the general success by his admirable assumption of the title rôle, while much praise is also bestowed upon the remaining artists engaged in the performance. The Neue Berliner Musik-Zeitung contains a highly eulogistic article on the event, in which it speaks of the music of the new work as being conceived in the best spirit of the grand opéra, instancing many of its component parts which, in the writer's opinion, are worthy of the best efforts of Meyerbeer—a fact which may serve to indicate the style of the composer generally. M. Joncières's Opera, as mentioned in our last number, is likewise in course of preparation at the Berlin Opera House, where still greater justice will presumably be rendered to this interesting novelty, which also recommends itself to the attention of one or the other of our London impresarii.

The Paris correspondent of the Daily Telegraph writes, under date 7th ult. :—"The Sunday afternoon Concerts at the spacious Eden Theatre continue to attract crowds, and the admirable orchestra, conducted by M. Lamoureux, still proves itself the best in Paris. Yesterday's programme comprised no Symphony; but the five orchestral works performed were more than enough to test thoroughly the capacity of any band of instrumentalists. Wagner's 'Siegfried Idyll,' for instance, one of the most elaborate orchestral compositions of the Saxon master, could not possibly have received a more perfect interpretation. It appears that the Idyll was written to celebrate the birth of Wagner's son Siegfried, and that it was first performed on his wife's birthday, at Triebchen, on the Lake of Lucerne. Hans Richter, who was staying with the Maestro, got up a scratch orchestra for the occasion, and himself played the horn, Wagner conducting his own work, the principal themes of which are, of course, taken from the opera of the same name, the third of the famous Tetralogy. Mendelssohn's 'Fingal's Cave' Overture was also very finely played; and we have to thank M. Lamoureux for so often choosing for illustration a composer who is still unaccountably neglected in Paris."

M. Millet, the Paris sculptor, is executing a bust of the late Victor Massé by order of the French Ministry of Fine Arts, which is to be placed in the foyer of the National Opera.

The following amusing anecdote of Richard Wagner and Alexandre Dumas père is told by M. Ch. Monselet. The poet-composer (according to the narrator) generally received his visitors in mediæval costume, such as he always wore when composing. Alexandre Dumas, calling on him one day, was highly amused at the masquerade. "You are all dressed up to play Gessler," he said, with his good-natured laugh, which rather hurt the feelings of the author of "Tannhäuser," who nevertheless returned M. Dumas' visit when next he was at Paris. After some considerable delay, M. Dumas appeared at last dressed magnificently in a dressing-gown with a large flower pattern, a helmet with flying plumes, a life-belt round his waist, and enormous riding-boots. "Pardon me," said he, majestically, "for appearing in my working costume. I can do nothing without being dressed in this manner. Half my ideas live in this helmet, and the other half are lodged in my boots, which are indispensable to me when I write my love scenes." Se non è vero, è ben trovato!

M. Victor Wilder, the able translator into French of Wagner's book of "Die Meistersinger," has just published an equally meritorious version of "Die Walküre," the second part of the famous Tetralogy. M. Wilder, it is said, contemplates the rendering into his native language of the whole of Wagner's music dramas; no slight undertaking, as everyone acquainted, if only superficially, with the difficulties of such a task will admit.

The third part of Wagner's Tetralogy "Der Ring des Nibelungen," entitled "Siegfried," was produced for the first time (sic) at the Royal Opera House of Berlin, on the 8th ult. The work is generally admitted to have been magnificently put on the stage, while its representation generally left much to be desired. The performance in question has nevertheless been an event for the countrymen of the poet-composer, whose eyes are yet directed into the 'dim and distant future' when this gigantic national work 'shall be produced, in its entirety, by the representative stage of the capital.

The Bayreuth Festival, to be held next summer, it is now officially announced, will comprise seventeen performances—viz., nine of "Parsifal" (Mondays and Fridays), and eight of "Tristan und Isolde" (Thursdays and Sundays). There will be a select orchestra of 110 performers, presided over alternately by Herren Hans Richter, Anton Seidl, H. Levi, and Felix Mottl. Professor Flüggen, the well known Munich painter, has been charged with superintending the costumes. The performances will commence on July 23.

A portrait of Wagner, said to be an excellent likeness of the poet-composer while in the prime of his career, has just been completed by the Viennese painter, Herr Gustav Gaul, and will be exhibited first in the United States and afterwards in this country.

A grand music-festival is to be held at Eutin, in December next, in connection with the celebration of the one-hundredth anniversary of the birth of Carl Maria von Weber. We are glad to learn that the subscriptions for the projected monument to be erected in the genial composer's native town, although as yet far from meeting actual requirements, are progressing steadily enough to encourage a hope that the period of its completion may coincide with the anniversary which it is intended to commemorate. A list of contributors to the fund, who should address the Committee of the Weber-Denkmal, Eutin (Holstein), will be published in due course.

A new opera by Herr Eugen Lindner, entitled "Ramiro," met with a very favourable reception on the 6th ult., at the Weimar Hof-Theater.

M. Massenet's new opera "Le Cid," with a German version of the libretto by Herr Max Kalbeck, is to be produced in March next at the Imperial Opera of Vienna, Madame Pauline Lucca having undertaken to represent the part of Chimène on that occasion.

Shakespeare's "As you like it," with the incidental music arranged from Schubert's "Rosamunde," has been performed at the Hamburg Stadt-Theater, and in this form has materially increased its powers of attraction.

The following works by the well-reputed German organist and composer, Herr Otto Diemel, were included in the programmes of Concert performances recently held at Berlin, viz.—Organ Fantasia on the hymn "Nun lob mein' Seel den Herrn"; Fantasia on the first five notes of the A minor scale; first movement and Allegro finale from the sixth grand Organ Sonata; and an Allegretto Pastorale for the same instrument.

We have noticed with much pleasure in the Berlin Allgemeine Musik-Zeitung a very eulogistic and sympathetic article, from the pen of Herr Otto Lessmann, respecting the first Concert recently given in that capital by Mr. Frederic Lamond, a native of Glasgow, and pupil of Dr. von Bülow and Franz Liszt. Speaking of the performance by the young pianist (he is only seventeen years of age), of such a test piece as Beethoven's Sonata (Op. 106), the above well-known critic remarks: "Mr. Lamond had not only completely mastered the technical difficulties of the work, but had inwardly grasped and digested its import, which essential elements combined, enabled him to reproduce the composition with an amount of clearness and warmth that was truly surprising." Pieces by Brahms, Schumann, Chopin, and Liszt completed the programme of the Concert in question, which was followed by a second and equally successful one on the 11th ult.

Mr. Lamond, it would appear from the above, and other indications which have reached us, will, ere long, assume a high position in the ranks of modern pianoforte players.

Herr Johannes Brahms's new (fourth) Symphony will be published during the present year by N. Simrock, of Berlin, as well as an arrangement of the work for two pianofortes.

Herr Joachim will play at M. Colonne's classical Paris Concerts, as also in the South of France, during the present month, previous to his annual reappearance at the Popular Concerts in St. James's Hall.

Some excellent performances are reported to us from Hamburg of Gluck's two "Iphigénias," of Tauris and in Aulis, which took place on the 2nd and 3rd ult., under direction of Herr Sucher, the well-known Capellmeister at the Stadt-Theater.

A "cycle" of Mozart's operas is to be given at the Imperial Viennese Opera during the present month, when the following works will be included, viz.: "Entführung aus dem Serail" ("Il Seraglio"), "Die Zauberflöte," "Don Juan," "Figaro," and "Cosi fan tutte." Why "Idomeneo" and "La Clemenza di Tito" are to be excluded from these cyclical representations is not stated.

We hear from Vienna of a most successful performance, on the 6th ult., of Mr. Mackenzie's Second Scotch Rhapsody at one of the Philharmonic Concerts, conducted by Herr Hans Richter.

At the International Conference respecting the musical diapason, recently held at the Austrian capital, it has been decided that the delegates should recommend to their respective governments the adoption of the Paris normal A, a result which we ventured to foreshadow in these columns. We refer to this subject at greater length in another part of our present issue.

An excellent performance of Handel's rarely-heard Oratorio "Susannah" took place on the 3rd ult., at Aachen (Aix-la-Chapelle), under the direction of Herr Julius Kniess.

A musical performance in honour of Anton Rubinstein was announced to be held at Vienna, previous to the departure of the eminent pianist-composer for Russia. The Orchestra of the Conservatorium, conducted by Herr Helmesberger, was to take part in the proceedings. Rubinstein will resume his remarkable Historical Pianoforte Recitals in the French capital in April next.

A report has been making the round of the German press to the effect that Herr Max Friedländer, while intent upon his search after Schubert manuscripts for the purpose of his forthcoming complete edition of that master's songs, has discovered in an Austrian village a hitherto unknown Pianoforte Concerto by Beethoven. We are sorry to inform those of our readers who may have noticed it that there is no foundation whatever for the statement.

Anton Rubinstein has furnished Continental musical gossip with an anecdote sufficiently characteristic to be repeated in these columns. During his recent stay at Berlin, the pianist-composer, who had just completed one of the gigantic programmes of his notable "Seven Historical Concerts," was asked by an aspiring lady-artist whether, with his wonderful command over the instrument, he still found it necessary to practise every day. "Madame," replied the genial virtuoso, "were I to omit going through my exercises one day, I would notice it in my playing; if a second day, you would notice it; and if a third day, the public would notice it. That is why I go on practising every day." Thus the young artist obtained a somewhat obvious but none the less valuable lesson—for the asking.

A new orchestral suite from the pen of Herr Heinrich Hofmann will shortly be produced for the first time at one of the Philharmonic Concerts of Berlin.

Herr Angelo Neumann, the whilom impresario of the self-styled "Wagner Theatre," now the director of the German opera at Prague, is said to contemplate an Italian campaign with the personnel of his establishment, and the exclusive performance of Nessler's "Trompeter von Säckingen." A strange desertion of his flag on the part of a reputed champion of the Wagnerian music-drama—if true!

A Society of Ladies has recently been formed at Munich, under the presidency of the Baroness von Perfall, for the cultivation and occasional private performance of high-class choral music for female voices.

Dr. Hans von Bülow has, it is announced, definitely resigned his post as Conductor of the Meiningen Court-orchestra, after having, in the course of a few years, succeeded in raising that institution to a position of European fame. The reasons which have prompted this decision on the part of the celebrated musician are said to be of an entirely private character.

A new four-act opera, entitled "Graf-Hammerstein," by the well-known violoncello virtuoso, Herr Jules de Swert, has met with a very favourable reception upon its recent first production at the Stadt-Theater of Breslau.

The first prize for the composition of an opera, offered by the Directors of the Apollo Theatre, at Rome, has been awarded jointly to Signori Antonio Leonardi and Stanislas Falchi. The successful works will shortly be brought out by the establishment referred to.

Wagner's "Lohengrin" has met with a most enthusiastic reception on its recent first performance at the Royal Opera of Madrid. The tenor, Signor Stagno, is said to have been a highly efficient Knight of the Swan.

The German Theatre at Moscow was destroyed by fire on the 6th ult., without, fortunately, involving any loss of human life. Owing to the want of a suitable temporary locality, the personnel of the establishment has been thrown out of employment by the catastrophe.

We extract the following from the Times of the 22nd ult.: "The performance of a Russian opera by M. Solovieff, a young and comparatively unknown composer, has created a sensation at St. Petersburg. The libretto is founded on Sardou's drama 'La Haine,' but in its Russian form the work is called 'Cordelia,' after the name of the heroine. The representative of that character, Madame Pavloski, is highly spoken of, as is also M. Priantchnikow in the part of Orso, the hero and tenor of the piece."

Mr. Mapleson's Italian Opera season in New York has already come to a close. High prices of admission, an inferior company, and the absence of novelty in the répertoire, are said to have been the combined cause of this abrupt termination of the undertaking.

Madame Christine Nilsson will, it is said, shortly make her début as an authoress. Her first contribution to literature is to be an essay entitled "A Music Lesson," and will be published in The Youth's Companion, a Boston periodical.

Under the title of "Die Tonkunst und ihre Meister," a German version of the Rev. Mr. Haweis's well-known volume, "Music and Morals," has just been issued by Henius and Krakau (Klemann's Verlag), of Berlin. It is edited by Herr Alexander Moszkowski, who has excluded from it a considerable portion of the matter contained in the original. Curiously enough, the editorial scissors have been most actively employed upon the chatty and amusing chapters dealing with some peculiar phases of English musical life, and which, one would imagine, should have been among the most interesting to our Teutonic neighbours. As it is, shorn to a great extent of its eclectic and vivacious elements, Mr. Haweis's book assumes, in its German garb, an air of scientific importance which it certainly does not possess.

We have received further instalments of Dr. Riemann's "Opfern Handbuch," extending as far as the word "Margherita." This interesting work was originally announced to be completed in eight parts, but, as is the case with most similar undertakings, the material has grown under the compiler's hands, and according to the present forecast the number of parts will have to be increased to fourteen, with the result, no doubt, of rendering it much more useful ultimately.

We have also received the first numbers of a fortnightly journal, Der Chorgesang, devoted to the interests of choral societies and published by Messrs. Licht & Meyer, of Leipzig. Herr N. W. Gottschalg, court organist at Weimar, is the editor of the new publication, which is supported by able writers, and will doubtless meet with much appreciation in the quarters for which it is more especially intended. Eight pages of original compositions are appended to each number.

A highly interesting volume of letters by Robert Schumann, emanating from an early period of his life, has just been issued by Messrs. Breitkopf and Härtel, under the editorship of the composer's widow.

At Florence died, at the age of sixty-seven, Dr. Abramo Basevi, distinguished for his active interest in the musical life of that town, and author of several meritorious works connected with the art, amongst them a "Compendio della Storia della Musica," and "Studio sulle opere di G. Verdi." Signor Basevi was the possessor of one of the most valuable musical libraries in Italy.

The death is announced last month, at Sorrento, at an advanced age, of Raffaele Mirate, the once celebrated tenor, whose singing in Bellini's opera, "Il Pirata," at La Scala, of Milan, brought that composer into sudden fame, and for whom Verdi subsequently wrote the part of the Duke, in "Rigoletto."

The death is also announced, at Milan, of the celebrated Italian poet and librettist, Andrea Maffei, the translator of Shakespeare, Milton, Byron, Goethe, Schiller, Heine, and many other standard authors. He also wrote (as the Daily News reminds us) the book for Verdi's "I Masnadieri," founded on Schiller's "Robbers," and produced, for the first time on any stage, at Her Majesty's Theatre in 1847, with Jenny Lind, Gardoni, and Lablache, in the chief parts, the composer himself conducting. Maffei had reached the age of eighty-two.

CORRESPONDENCE.

CHARLES DIBDIN.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—I am preparing a Lecture upon the Life and Ballads of Charles Dibdin, and shall be most grateful to any of your readers who can give me any interesting and authentic information about him and his Ballad Operas. I can find no clear explanation of Garrick's quarrel with and apparent ill-feeling towards him. If any one can enlighten me, he will be doing a kindness to

Yours truly,

ARTHUR SEWELL.

Waterloo House, Leamington, December 12, 1885.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

. Notices of concerts, and other information supplied by our friends in the country, must be forwarded as early as possible after the occurrence; otherwise they cannot be inserted. Our correspondents must specifically denote the date of each concert, for without such date no notice can be taken of the performance.

Our correspondents will oblige by writing all names as clearly as possible, as we cannot be responsible for any mistakes that may occur.

Correspondents are informed that their names and addresses must accompany all communications.

We cannot undertake to return offered contributions; the authors, therefore, will do well to retain copies.

Notice is sent to all Subscribers whose payment (in advance) is exhausted. The paper will be discontinued where the Subscription is not renewed. We again remind those who are disappointed in obtaining back numbers that, although the music is always kept in stock, only a sufficient quantity of the rest of the paper is printed to supply the current sale.

BRIEF SUMMARY OF COUNTRY NEWS.

We do not hold ourselves responsible for any opinions expressed in this Summary, as all the notices are either collated from the local papers or supplied to us by correspondents.

ADDISCOMBE.—Mr. Edwin Samson, R.A.M., gave an Organ Recital at Christ Church, on Thursday, the 17th ult., and played with considerable skill selections from Mendelssohn, Bach, Wely, Baisite, &c. The organ was displayed to the utmost advantage by the executant, more particularly in Bach's G minor Fugue and Wely's Offertoire in C. Mr. Thurley Beale, Mrs. White, and Miss Kerr contributed several solos from the Oratorios.

ALLOA, N.B.—Judas Maccabæus was given by the Choral Society on the evening of the 18th ult., the solos being rendered by Misses Minnie Beaumont and Sneddon, and Messrs. Macdonald and Pierpoint in a highly effective manner. Miss Beaumont was accorded a hearty reception, her singing being greatly admired. The choruses were well rendered. Mr. Locker conducted.

AMPTHILL.—The Musical Society gave the first Concert of the present season in the Court Hall, on the 3rd ult., to mark the bicentenary of Handel's birth. The programme was selected from The Messiah, Samson, Judas, &c. The soloists were Mrs. Harrison, Mrs. Kingston, Mr. Warwick, and Mr. Kingston. The choruses and instrumental selections were well rendered, under the conductorship of Mr. H. W. Stewardson, L.Mus., T.C.L.

BAMFORD, NEAR ROCHDALE.—On Sunday evening, the 20th ult., the members of the Congregational Church choir gave their annual Christmas performance of The Messiah. The solo parts were sustained by Miss Clara Ashworth, Miss Barker, Mr. J. H. Ogden, and Mr. R. Kershaw. Most of the choruses were given in an admirable manner, reflecting great credit on Mr. C. J. Porritt, the Conductor. The accompaniments were well played on the organ by Mr. David Clegg, Organist of the Church. There was a large audience.

BELEFAST.—The Heckman Quartet appeared at the Concerts of the Philharmonic Society on November 27 and 30, Herr Beyschlag being the pianist. The variety of the programme was much appreciated.—The members of the Philharmonic Society gave a fine performance of Mendelssohn's Oratorio Eljah, in the Ulster Hall, on the 18th ult. The solo vocalists were Miss Mary Davies, Miss Wakefield, Mr. Hirwen Jones, and Mr. H. G. Thordike, all of whom were highly efficient. The choruses were excellently sung. Mr. Edgar Haines led the band, Mr. John Shillington presided at the organ, and Herr Beyschlag conducted.

BIRKENHEAD.—On Thursday, the 17th ult., a Special Service was held in the Church of the Holy Trinity for the purpose of re-opening the organ, which has been almost entirely rebuilt and removed, new action having been introduced throughout. It has been in every way put in excellent condition, and reflects great credit upon the organ builder, Mr. Richard Tubbs, of Liverpool, who has designed and carried out the entire work. The instrument has two manuals and pedals, twenty speaking stops, three couplers, three composition pedals, &c. The organist of the church, Mr. Billie Porter, presided, and special praise being due to Miss Marriott for her exquisite rendering of the solos, "Where art thou, Father?" and "Oh, Virgin Mother." The orchestra was composed of members of Mr. Charles Halle's band, and the performance was under the conductorship of Mr. James H. Rooks, of Bradford, to whom great credit is due for the efficient manner in which the work was interpreted by both chorus and orchestra. The second part of the programme was Mendelssohn's Concert. The Concert, which was most successful, was attended by a large audience.

BLACKBURN.—The first Concert of the eleventh season of the St. Cecilia Society was given in the Exchange Hall on Monday, the 14th ult. The first part of the programme consisted of Dvorák's Cantata, The Spectre's Bride, the solo parts in which were well sustained by Miss Annie Marriott, Mr. Charles Sangro, and Mr. John Higginson, special praise being due to Miss Marriott for her exquisite rendering of the solos, "Where art thou, Father?" and "Oh, Virgin Mother." The orchestra was composed of members of Mr. Charles Halle's band, and the performance was under the conductorship of Mr. James H. Rooks, of Bradford, to whom great credit is due for the efficient manner in which the work was interpreted by both chorus and orchestra. The second part of the programme was Mendelssohn's Concert. The Concert, which was most successful, was attended by a large audience.

BRENTWOOD.—The members of the Vocal and Instrumental Society gave an excellent performance of Barnett's Paradise and the Peri, followed by a short miscellaneous selection, on Thursday evening, the 17th ult., in the Town Hall. The principal vocalists were Madame Clara West, Miss Lottie West, Mr. Alex Colbourne, and Mr. Frank Ward; leader of the band, Mr. A. Byford; accompanist, Mr. W. W. Eburn; Conductor, Mr. J. W. Case. The Concert was highly successful.

BRIGHTON.—A musical performance, which so far as Brighton is concerned, has been paralleled of late years only by the performance of 1883 of Gounod's Redemption, took place in the Dome on Thursday evening, the 3rd ult., when Mr. Kuhe gave residents in this town an opportunity of hearing the same composer's last great work, Mors et Vita, the music of which created a profound impression upon the audience. The choruses were finely rendered throughout. The absence of Madame Valleria, owing to the indisposition, occasioned some disappointment, but Miss Annie Marriott, an excellent substitute was found, and she must be congratulated upon the marked success with which she executed her task. The other soloists were Madame Patey, Mr. Edward Lloyd, and Mr. Santley, and, with such vocalists as these, it is almost unnecessary to say that the solo parts were rendered to perfection. At the close of the performance, Mr. Kuhe, as he had the honour to be called, was called to the platform to receive a hearty recognition from the audience.—The Choral and Orchestral Society gave a very successful Concert in the Dome, on Thursday evening, the 10th ult., conducted by Dr. Frank J. Sawyer. A fine performance of Dr. Bridge's Rock of Ages (conducted by the composer) opened the first part. Mr. Ernest Birch sang the solos in a refined and artistic manner, and was, with the composer, warmly recalled at the conclusion of the work. Amongst other items were Handel's Organ Concerto in D minor, finely played by Dr. Bridge, and the first movement of Beethoven's C minor Symphony by the orchestra. The second part consisted of Bach's Christmas Oratorio, in which the soloists were Madame Joyce Maas, Mr. Lawrence Fryer, and Mr. Ernest Birch. A long programme of pianoforte music was performed by Mr. Aguilar's pupils, in the Saloon, Pavilion, on the 15th ult. Among the pieces specially deserving commendation may be mentioned Beethoven's Sonata (Op. 53), Oberthur's "Geister-Beschwörung," Stendal Bennett's Impromptu, No. 2, and Scherzo from Op. 13; Thalberg's "Home, sweet home," and Bendel's "Cascade du Chaudron." Mr. Aguilar played Prelude and Fugue (Clementi) and two compositions of his own, "Contented," and Boiero.

BRIGHTON-IN-FURNESS.—The Choral Society gave the first Concert of its third season on Thursday, the 19th ult., when Pattison's Cantata, The Lay of the Last Minstrel, was performed. The solos were well sung by Miss E. A. Blackburn, Miss Woodburn, Mr. A. Pass, and Mr. A. McCall. The choir, consisting of about thirty-five voices, was well balanced, and sung with much taste and expression. The second part was miscellaneous, and consisted of songs, part-songs, and instrumental pieces. Mr. G. H. Parkinson conducted.

CHARD.—The first Concert of the season by the members of the Musical Society was given on Tuesday, the 15th ult., under the conductorship of Mr. W. E. Ellen, A.C.O., when Gade's Cantata, The Erl King's Daughter, was performed very effectively. The whole of the soprano solos were taken by Miss Julia Jones, whose fine voice was heard to great advantage. In the second part of the programme, which consisted of a miscellaneous selection, Miss Jones was most enthusiastically encored, as was also Mrs. Powne, a local artist.

CHEPSTOW.—The members of the Choral Society gave their first Concert of this season, on the 16th ult., at the Beaufort Rooms, before a large audience. Smart's Bride of Dunkeyron and a selection of glees, songs, &c., were creditably rendered. Madame Williams Penn, Mr. Banks (Hereford Cathedral), and Mr. Johns were the principal vocalists. Mr. A. E. Kingsford conducted, and Miss Booth, of Gloucester, accompanied.

DOLLAR, N.B.—On Friday evening, the 11th ult., a very successful Concert was given by the members of the Musical Association. The first part consisted of Mr. J. More Smither's Cantata Adriane, which was received with much favour, the final Choral March having to be repeated. In the second part, a very creditable rendering was given of Handel's Serenata Acis and Galatea. A small but efficient band supplied the accompaniments. Mr. James McHardy conducted.

DOVER.—The members of the Harmonic Society gave a very successful performance of Handel's Messiah in the Town Hall, on the 10th ult. The solo vocalists were Miss Marian Lynton, Miss Katherine James, Mr. Oldroyd, and Mr. Fred Bevan, all of whom were thoroughly efficient. Mr. Howells conducted.

DUMFRIES.—Mr. Sinclair Dunn, assisted by Miss Susetta Penn, gave his popular Lecture Concert, "Burns in Dumfries," in the Mechanics Hall, on the 4th ult., in aid of the Royal Infirmary. Mr. Dunn was highly successful in all his songs—"Phillis the Fair," "Awa, Whigs, awa," and "Fair Maid on Devon's Banks," being received with the greatest favour. Miss Penn, not only sang well, but contributed much to the success of the evening by her excellent pianoforte playing.

EASTBOURNE.—The Musical Society gave a successful performance of Handel's Messiah, at the Devonshire Park Pavilion, on Thursday evening, the 17th ult. The solos were entrusted to Miss Kate Norman, Miss Alice Grey, Mr. Dalzell, and Mr. F. Bevan, all of whom acquitted themselves in a highly commendable manner. The band and chorus were augmented above their ordinary strength; Herr Cramer was leader of the orchestra, Mr. S. R. Coles presided at the piano, and Mr. George Legge at the organ. Dr. Sangster filling the position of Conductor in his customary manner, and the remarkable success attained being largely attributable to his care and judgment. The choruses were given on the whole with much effect, and the band was highly efficient.

EMSWORTH.—The ninth Concert of the Emsworth and Westbourne Musical Society was given on the 16th ult. Cowen's Cantata, The Rose Maiden, formed the first part, the principal vocalists being Miss Kate Norman, Mrs. Seymour Kelly, and Messrs. Charles Chillely and Seymour Kelly. The music of the Cantata is extremely melodious and effective, and was well rendered. The second part consisted of a miscellaneous selection. Miss Hodge presided at the pianoforte and Mr. J. W. D. Pillow at the harmonium. Mr. C. Pillow, of Chichester, conducted with much ability.

EWELL, SURREY.—The members of the Choral Society gave a Concert at the Lecture Hall, on the 15th ult. The first part of the programme consisted of the Cantata The Jackdaw of Rheims, by George Fox, and the second part was miscellaneous. The whole entertainment was well carried out, under the able conductorship of Mr. Charles N. Frecknall. With the exception of Miss Adela Duckham, a student at the Guildhall School of Music, who was engaged to play violin solos, the artists were all members of the Society.

FROME.—On Monday, the 7th ult., a performance of Handel's Messiah was given in the Wesley Chapel, in aid of the Renovation Fund. The principal soloists were Miss Marie Gane, R.A.M., Mrs. Matthews, Mr. C. Tucker, Mr. J. B. King, and Mr. S. J. Lewis, all of whom were thoroughly efficient. The choruses were, on the whole, well rendered. Mr. T. Grant conducted, and Mr. F. Derry ably presided at the organ.

HALSTEAD.—The Harmonic Society gave its first Concert, in the Town Hall, on the 8th ult., when Prout's Freedom, and a miscellaneous selection, were performed. The principal vocalists were Madame Clara West, Miss Lottie West, and Mr. J. Edwards; solo violinist and leader of the band, Mr. J. B. King; pianist, Miss Hayward; Conductor, Mr. Arthur Dunn.

HARROGATE.—A performance of The Messiah was given in the Spa Concert Room, on the 10th ult., in aid of the Cottage Hospital. The artists were Miss Winnie Beaumont, Miss Ada Batley, Mr. Sewell, and Mr. P. J. Paley. The band, Mr. J. B. King, and Mr. S. J. Lewis, all of whom were thoroughly efficient. The work was very fairly rendered, the soloists being thoroughly efficient. Mr. G. Fawcett presided at the organ.

HAWICK.—On the 9th ult., Mr. W. Fiddes Wilson, Organist of St. John's Church, gave his annual Organ Recital, before a highly appreciative audience. The programme was of the utmost interest, and included a selection from Gounod's Mors et Vita, which was well arranged and most effective, the trumpet interludes, by Mr. F. Gray, materially enhancing the success of the piece. The vocalist was Madame Laura Smart, whose singing was much admired.

HIGH WYCOMBE.—On the 16th ult., the Choral Association gave its first Concert of the season. The programme included Schubert's song of Miriam, Lloyd's song of Balder, Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto, Mozart's Pianoforte Concerto in B flat, Overture (Oberon), &c. The principal artists were Miss Catherine Penna, Mr. S. D. Grimson (solo violin), and Mr. J. G. Wrigley (solo pianoforte). There was a large audience, and the Concert was most successful. Mr. J. G. Wrigley, F.C.O., Mus. Bac. Oxon., conducted.

HULL.—Sir George Macfarren's Oratorio, King David, was performed by the Harmonic Society, in the Public Rooms, on the 11th ult., with great success. The principal vocalists were Mrs. Wilson Osman, Miss A. M. Iggledd, Mr. Maldwyn Humphreys, and Mr. Musgrave Tufnall, all of whom gave the utmost effect to the solos allotted to them. The choir was excellent throughout, and reflected the highest credit upon the Society's new Conductor, Mr. Walter Porter, F.C.O., who must have worked hard to produce so satisfactory a result. Mr. Winter was the leader of the band, and Mr. Walter Hoskins presided, with much ability, at the organ.

ILKESTON.—Handel's Oratorio Judas Maccabeus was performed by the members of the Ilkeston and District Harmonic Society, in the Town Hall, at their opening concert of the season, on the 24th ult. The principal vocalists were Miss Bessie Holt, R.A.M.; Miss Lizzie Wintembs, Mr. Harper Kearton, and Mr. Fred. Gordon. The band consists of some hundred well-performers. Mr. J. S. Geddis led, and Mr. Gaskin conducted. The work was excellently rendered.

LEAMINGTON.—An excellent performance of Gounod's Redemption was given in the Parish Church by the Musical Society, on Wednesday, the 16th ult., in aid of the Church Completion Fund. The solo vocalists were Miss Carlotta Elliott, Miss Hilda Wilson, Mr. Edward Lloyd, and Mr. Frederic King. The orchestra was complete in every detail. The Oratorio was preceded and closed with prayer. In the absence (through illness) of Mr. Frank Spinney, the Conductor of the Society, the Idion was kindly taken by Mr. W. C. Stockley, of Birmingham.

LEICESTER.—At the fortnightly meeting of the Orchestral Union, on Monday, the 7th ult., after the usual rehearsal, Mr. H. B. Ellis, F.C.O., the honorary Conductor, was presented by the members with a handsome gold watch. Mr. T. Carter, the President of the Union, in making the presentation, paid a high compliment to Mr. Ellis for his efforts on behalf of the Society, and said that the members were glad to have this opportunity of marking more emphatically their recognition of his services.

LEWISHAM.—An Organ Recital was given in St. John's Church, on Tuesday, the 12th ult., by Mr. Edwin Samson, R.A.M., Organist of Christ Church, Addiscombe. The programme consisted of works by Mendelssohn, Bach, Sterndale Bennett, Wely, and Batiste. Mr. Samson's performance was highly effective. Vocal solos were contributed by Mr. Reginald Groome, who sang "If with all your hearts" (Elijah), "Total Eclipse" (Samson), and "The soft southern breeze" (Rebekah).

MADELEY, SALOP.—On Tuesday, the 8th ult., the Choral Society gave a performance of the May Queen, and a miscellaneous selection, with a May Queen, by the Rev. A. H. E. Pender, and Mr. Edward Griffin (of the English Opera Company), as principal vocalists. The accompaniments were rendered on a Mustel organ and pianoforte by Mr. J. Clarke, L.R.A.M., and Mr. Parkes respectively. Mr. Smart, as usual, conducted.

MAIDENHEAD.—On the 17th ult., the members of the Philharmonic Society gave their opening Concert in the Town Hall. The programme included Schubert's Song of Miriam, Lloyd's Song of Balder, Overture, Oberon (Weber), "Cornelius" March (Mendelssohn), Mozart's Piano Concerto in B flat, Entr'acte, Manfred (Reinecke), &c. The principal artists were Miss Catherine Penna, vocalist; Mr. Morley, R.A.M., solo violin; and Mr. J. G. Wrigley, solo pianoforte, who also conducted. The performance was exceedingly fine, the chorus-singing especially being much above the average.

NEW WORTLEY, LEEDS.—On Sunday, November 29, a new Sacred Cantata, The Promised Land, by Arthur Pearson, was given for the first time by the choir of the Long Road Chapel. The Cantata, which has been highly spoken of by the Leeds journals, is inscribed to Dr. Roberts, of Oxford, and consists of sixteen numbers, many of which are conspicuous for their pure melodic beauty, the solos for the tenor being especially effective. The work was in every sense successful, and to Mr. Foster, the Conductor, is due much praise for the manner in which it was rendered. On the 12th ult., the Cantata was performed in the Leeds Town Hall, under the auspices of the Tabernacle Sunday School. The solo vocalists were Miss Alice Foster, who was assisted by Miss Annie Woods, Miss Maggie Riley, Mr. D. J. Kennedy, and Mr. Dan Billington. Mr. T. Thompson conducted, and Dr. Spark presided at the grand organ.

NEW YORK.—Weber's Jubilee Cantata was recently sung at the Monthly Festival Service in St. John's Church. The following members of the choir were the soloists:—Mr. Whitney Mockridge (tenor). Mr. Chomeley-Jones (bass), Mr. T. M. Greenhalgh (alto), and Masters Felix Wendelschaefer and George Chapman (soprano). Organist and Director, Mr. G. F. Le Jeune.

NORTHAMPTON.—The performance of Mr. Alfred R. Gaul's Cantata The Colleen Bawn was given on Monday, the 12th ult., with great success. The solo vocalists were Miss Emilie Lloyd, Mrs. G. H. Barton, R.A.M., Miss Nellie Hollis, and Mr. Arthur Edwards. Under the conductorship of Mr. R. W. Strickland, both choir and orchestra were highly satisfactory, and the work was received with much favour. In the second part of the programme the principal item was Dr. Bridge's setting of Mr. Gladstone's translation of Rock of Ages—the solo by Mr. J. C. Edwards, which was well rendered by Mr. W. W. Warren, and by Mr. A. W. Warren, and Mr. Ebenezzer Law was the organist.

NORTH CADBURY.—A Bach and Handel Festival took place in this village on the 10th ult. The present squire, who is a musical enthusiast, has erected, close to his mansion, a plain but commodious structure for dramatic and musical representations, and it was in this that the performance was held. That he was assisted by a band and chorus as anxious to improve the musical taste of himself, may be judged from the fact that the majority of the performers had to drive distances varying from three to twenty miles to reach home after the Concert. The programme was divided into three parts: I. being selected from the Jassion music of St. Matthew; Bach; II., a miscellaneous selection from the works of Bach and Handel; and III., a selection from The Messiah. Space will not permit of detailed criticism, it will suffice to say generally that the various parts were exceedingly well rendered. With the exception of the bass solos, sung by Mr. Aequith, the principal parts were entrusted to amateurs, the solos best rendered being those of the Misses Ensor, and that of Mr. Gregory. The hall was crammed, and a considerable number were unable to gain admission. Mr. Bennett is to be heartily congratulated on the success of his present endeavour, which we trust may encourage him not to relax his efforts in the cause of the spread of good music in the neighbourhood.

NORTHFLEET.—The members of the Gravesend and Milton Choral Association gave a performance of Haydn's Creation at the Factory Hall, on Monday evening, the 14th ult. The solo vocalists were Miss Eleanor Farnol, Mr. Sidney Tower, and Mr. Franklin Clive. The effective manner in which these artists rendered the solo music elicited the heartiest approval of a large and appreciative audience. The choruses were all admirably sung. The undoubted success of the performance redounds largely to the credit of Mr. Charles R. Green, the Conductor. The orchestra was supplied by the members of the Royal Engineer Band, Chatham.

NORWICH.—Special interest centred in the Concert given by the Norwich Festival Choral Society, in St. Andrew's Hall, on the 10th ult. It was the opening campaign of this Society's efforts since the Triennial Festival of last year; and the principal work selected for performance was the new Oratorio, Nehemiah, the composition of the valued Conductor and Chorus-master, Dr. Horace Hill. The band of the Norwich Philharmonic Society, led by Mr. W. B. Novell, had been augmented to some fifty instrumentalists, and the choir was little short of 200 voices, with Dr. Bennett at the organ, and Miss Margaret Hoare, Miss George Booth, Mr. Ben. Davies, Mr. W. H. Brereton, and Mr. J. H. Brockbank, as principal vocalists. Since its first performance by the Diss Choral Society, the Oratorio has been considerably re-modelled and amplified; and its success on the Norwich occasion was well secured by the excellent rendering of sacred works. At the conclusion of the performance, Dr. Hill was recalled to the platform and warmly applauded by both audience and executives.

PURSEY.—On Monday evening, the 7th ult., the Eighth Annual Subscription Concert of the Choral Union was given in the Public Hall, Barmby's Rebekah and Bennett's Woman of Samaria being the works performed. The principal vocalists were Miss Cockcroft, Miss Gregg, Mr. Acott, and Mr. Riley. Both compositions were excellently rendered, the beautiful contralto air, "O Lord Thou hast searched me out," in the Woman of Samaria, being warmly applauded, and an encore of the unaccompanied Quartet, "God is a Spirit," being unanimously demanded, and acceded to. The whole was under the able conductorship of Mr. Hartwell Robertshaw, and the band under the leadership of Mr. H. H. Heap.

QUEBEC, CANADA.—On Friday, November 27, Mr. A. E. Bishop, Organist of Quebec Cathedral, gave his first Recital for the season under the Cathedral organ. There was a large and appreciative audience. The programme was excellently rendered.

READING.—The members of the Philharmonic Society gave a performance of Handel's Messiah in the new Town Hall, on the 12th ult. The solo vocalists were Miss A. Parry, Miss A. Arnold, Mr. Harper Kearton, and Mr. Musgrove Tufnell. The band was led by Mr. J. W. Gunniss, Mr. F. J. Read, Mus. Bac., presided at the organ, and Mr. W. H. Strickland conducted.

RETFOED.—A Concert under the direction of Mr. Hamilton White was given in the Town Hall, on the 16th ult., before a numerous audience. There was a chorus of about sixty voices, the music for the choir being excellently rendered. The programme consisted of Mr. A. C. Mackenzie's Cantata, The Bride. The instrumentalists were Miss Clark (piano), Mr. T. H. Denman (harp), Mr. Rowland (flute), Mr. Robinson (contrabasso), and Messrs. F. Ashley and Saxby (cornets), the music being so arranged by the Conductor as to give the effect of a full orchestra. The tenor solos were sung by Mr. J. Mellor, and the duet by Miss Howett, and Mr. Mellor. The first part also included a piano and violin duet by Miss Denman and Mr. Peck, of Sheffield, and a song by Mr. T. E. Mackie. The second portion of the programme consisted of a number of favourite glees and part songs, all of which were admirably interpreted.

ST. LEONARDS-ON-SEA.—At a series of Special Services given fortnightly in St. Paul's Church—the second of which took place on Thursday, the 3rd ult.—Spohr's Last Judgment was sung, the concerted portions being taken by the amateur members of the society. The third took place on Wednesday evening, the 16th ult., when Handel's Messiah was sung. Mr. W. Winn (of St. Paul's Cathedral) and Madame Florence Winn—together with the amateur members of the class and Dr. Abram's pupils—taking the principal concerted portions of this immortal work. Gounod's Mors et Vita, Mendelssohn's St. Paul, with other important works are being rehearsed for performance early in the new year. The third part of the service was sung by St. Leonard's and Hastings Choral Union terminated on Tuesday, the 22nd ult. This society has, under its Conductor, Dr. Abram, done good service since it commenced this, its sixteenth session, in October last.

STAFFORD.—On the 11th ult., Dr. E. W. Taylor, F.C.O., gave an Organ Recital at Christ Church, Stone, on the occasion of the reopening of the organ, which has been enlarged, and removed from the gallery to the chancel. An excellently rendered programme, selected from the works of Bach, Mendelssohn, Mozart, and Batiste, was listened to with great attention by a large congregation.

WARDOUR CASTLE.—An excellent Concert was given, on Monday, the 14th ult., by Mr. Henry J. McArdle, Organist of Lord Arundel. The vocalists were Mrs. Jeffery, Miss Carter, Mr. U. Coomba and Mr. Toms, all of whom were highly successful. Mr. Alfred Foley (Salisbury) was much appreciated in his two solos, and in the Rondo from Beethoven's Sonata (Op. 24), the pianoforte part of which was rendered in a most artistic manner by Mr. McArdle, the Conductor, who also performed the duties of accompanist, and played Beethoven's Sonata in A flat (Op. 26) and other solos in excellent style.

WARRINGTON.—The Musical Society opened its winter season, on the 9th ult., with a performance of Elijah, which was highly successful. The solo vocalists were Miss Adelaide Muller, who, although suffering from a cold, sang with much effect, Miss McKenzie, Mr. Iver McKay, and Mr. Brereton, who sustained the part of the Prophet admirably. The choir was somewhat unsteady in parts; but the band, reinforced by some members of Mr. Charles Hall's orchestra, was thoroughly efficient. The Conductor was Dr. Hiles, and Mr. W. Johnson presided at the organ.

WESTERHAM.—On Friday evening, the 18th ult., the Public Hall was well filled on the occasion of an evening Concert in aid of the Church Choir Fund, under the able conductorship of Mr. Ernest H. Smith, A.C.O., the Organist and Choirmaster of the Parish Church. The programme was varied and well selected. The choruses were rendered in a manner that fully evidenced the good training of the voices, and the solos were well given by Mrs. Parsons, Mrs. Rooke, Mr. Cooper, and Mr. Sutton, many of them being redemanded.

WINDSOR.—The directors of the Windsor and Eton Choral Society began their present season well on the 18th ult., at the Albert Institute. Perhaps a better selection could hardly have been made than Mr. Joseph Barnby's Sacred Idyll Rebekah, and Mendelssohn's Athalie. The special interest of the concert, however, was the first performance of Rebekah, with the additional attraction that it was given under its composer's special direction. The artists were Miss Hilda Coward, Madame Poole, Miss Annie Knowles, Mr. James Gawthrop, of St. George's Chapel (whose departure from Windsor for St. James's Chapel Royal his Windsor friends will regret), and Mr. Vaughan Edwardes. The chorister boys of St. George's also rendered very material assistance. The second part of the concert (Athalie) was given under the direction of Mr. S. Smith, the principal vocalists being Miss Coward, Miss Knowles, and Madame Poole. The choruses, both in this and the preceding work, were exceedingly well rendered. Mr. Smith ably conducted, and may be congratulated on the success of his training of the band and choir. Mr. H. R. Coudrey presided at the harmonium, and Herr Gustav Morsch acted as leader of the band.

YORK.—The members of the Musical Society gave the second concert of the season on the 9th ult., the programme consisting of Rossini's Sabat Mater, and a miscellaneous selection. The solo vocalists were Miss Agnes Larkum, Miss Annie Cockcroft, Mr. Seymour Jackson, and Mr. W. Riley. Mr. Burton conducted. The work was well rendered. In the second part, Herr Padel's pianoforte playing was highly appreciated, and Mr. W. S. Child, the honorary Secretary, contributed to the success of the evening by his admirable pianoforte accompaniments.

ORGAN APPOINTMENTS.—Mr. Lacey Baker, Organist and Director of the Choir to the American Episcopal Church in Rome.—Mr. Alfred M. Richardson, to Keble College, Oxford.—Mr. Stanley C. Attwood, Organist and Choirmaster to St. Thomas's Church, Godolphin Road, Shepherd's Bush.—Mr. E. W. Little, to St. Baldred's, North Berwick.—Mr. T. ODOARDO BARRI'S

MASS FOR MALE VOICES (TWO TENORS AND TWO BASSES).

"The Gloria in Excelsis is as beautiful as it is impressive. . . The composer has evidently that genius for melody without which no amount of scientific knowledge and technical skill ever yet made musical compositions acceptable to the multitude, nor yet highly attractive even to persons of real musical culture."—Cheltenham Examiner, July 15, 1885.

"A musicianly work, the voices being written for throughout in a way that should be effective in result, and the harmonies being often very fine."—Liverpool Daily Post, May 4, 1885.

"There are comparatively few Masses written for tenors and basses alone. . . Any good contribution to this limited class of music must therefore be acceptable. Mr. Barri's Mass is melodious, well written, and, which is no small advantage, the first tenor part lies within the compass of any ordinary tenor singer."—Manchester Courier, June 2, 1885.

"To write for men's voices only is no easy task, as monotony of effect can hardly be avoided. Mr. Odoardo Barri has however so judiciously varied his tonalities and tempi as to prevent the ear being wearied."—Birmingham Gazette, May 26, 1885.

"The music is very melodious; indeed, the composer seems to excel in melody and modulation. Arranged for the orchestra, fine results might be got for horns and flutes from the Credo; the Sanctus, too, would admit of good orchestral effects; whilst the Benedictus and the Agnus Dei may all be mentioned as containing music likely to make the work a favourite."—Western Echo and Times, May 8, 1885.

"The voices are well treated throughout, and the music is never difficult."—Glasgow News, June 22, 1885.

"Mr. Barri's work is an attractive rendering of his text, and ought to be of practical value. It is characterised by an agreeable simplicity of style, and a devotional earnestness of treatment."—Glasgow Herald, July 9, 1885.

"A melodious Mass, in which devotional feeling and musical merit are happily blended. The music is free and flowing in style, and shows that the composer has studied in the best schools of sacred music. The blending of the four parts also reveals a genuine faculty for this kind of composition."—The Era, May 16, 1885.

"A composition of high merit; the Kyrie is very melodious and devotional; the Credo is grand, and replete with fine harmonies; but most beautiful of this work is the Agnus Dei, with its tenor solo and choral accompaniment."—The Graphic, August 1, 1885.

RUTH

Music by ALFRED R. GAUL.

"'Ruth' is a work of sterling power; its musical form is that of perfect tunelessness combined with simplicity and strength. There is nothing involved about it, nor the least straining after unattainable effects. The composer has grasped his theme in a thoroughly sympathetic manner, and has produced a work which is worthy of the subject. . . . One of the sweetest numbers in the Cantata is Ruth's solo, 'Entreat me not to leave thee,' which is instinct with pathetic expression. . . . Boaz's solo, 'Go not from hence, my daughter,' is another effective number. . . . A choral, 'Nightfall,' is an exquisitely beautiful conception; and the intermezzo, 'Daybreak,' and the jubilant Wedding Chorus which follows, are full of spirit and vivacity, rushing forward with a joyous bound that carries the audience completely away. An enthusiastic encore was given to the intermezzo and chorus."—Bradford Observer.

"That the idyllic story of Ruth is one admirably adapted for artistic illustration is unquestionable, and poets, painters, and musicians have over and over again made it a subject for the exercise of their talents, and we have no hesitation in saying that in its poetical and musical treatment by Mr. Oxenford and our townsman it has been invested with increased interest. . . . Pieces such as Mr. Gaul's Opus 34 are much wanted, and we believe that when the 'Ruth' Cantata is heard in our Town Hall it will be at once accepted as a valuable addition to our stock of music suitable for performance by fairly advanced and advancing societies."—Birmingham Daily Gazette.

"Bright, tuneful, fresh, and musically—this work will be a great favourite, and will add to Mr. Gaul's reputation. The second part will be liked better than the first. It opens in the harvest-field, and here the real idyll begins, and with it the charm and grace and freshness of Mr. Gaul's inspiration. The maidens' chorus, bright as the morning it greets, and the men's robust and vigorous reply, well introduce the fresh and melodious joy-breathing music of Ruth, the chastened yet hopeful address of Naomi, and the hearty generous welcome of Boaz. The work closes with a short but spirited chorus, 'Rejoice, ye blessings round us fall,' which will bear comparison with anything Mr. Gaul has written. An effective fugue passage carefully worked out, but not overdone, is inserted between strains of joyful acclamation of considerable freshness and vigour."—Birmingham Weekly Dart.

"'Ruth' has been set to music by several composers; none, however, has become so worthily popular as the Cantata under notice. Although somewhat simple in parts, it contains some charming music, and is highly characteristic of the story it so vividly illustrates."—South Wilts Express.

"Full of flowing melody."—Salisbury Times.

THE HOLY CITY

BY

ALFRED R. GAUL.

"The work is an honour to English Art, and has elevated its composer into a place of distinction amongst native musicians."—Queen.

"A good sound musical work is this 'Holy City.' I have no hesitation in saying that it creditably represents English art, and does honour not only to the skill but to the judgment and taste of Mr. Gaul."—Daily Telegraph.

"The reception was favourable in the extreme, and the Cantata must henceforth be classed among the successes which the Birmingham Musical Festivals have brought to light."—Standard.

"'The Holy City' is evidently the work of a thoughtful as well as a clever composer, and should make its mark among thoroughly English productions of a sacred character."—Musical Times.

"We hope and believe that the reception given last night to Mr. Gaul and to his 'Holy City' Cantata will prove an earnest of its popularity and acceptance throughout the length and breadth of the land."—Birmingham Daily Gazette.

"A most interesting, tuneful, and scholarly work."—Manchester Courier.

"This fine work will considerably enhance Mr. Gaul's reputation as a musician."—Liverpool Daily Courier.

THE MONTHS

TWELVE VOCAL DUETS FOR SCHOOL USE

MUSIC BY

ALFRED R. GAUL

(Composer of the "Holy City," "Ruth," &c.)

"There are in this series of duets the sweetest things of the kind we have ever met with. No. 4, 'April,' and No. 5, 'May,' are our special favourites, the one being delightfully playful, the other tenderly melodious. Things to be treasured in households where sisters or friends delight in joining voices. The pianoforte accompaniments are well written, and such as an ordinary pianist may successfully undertake."—Birmingham Daily Gazette.

A MAGAZINE OF MUSIC & MUSICAL LITERATURE.

To be published on the 1st of every Month by W. MORLEY & Co., 127, Regent Street, W.

Price 4d. (post-free, 5d.); Annual Subscription, including postage, 5s.

Messrs. W. MORLEY & CO. have the pleasure to announce their intention of issuing a New Musical Periodical, bearing the above title, which will appear on the 1st of each month, commencing March, 1886.

Its object will be the dissemination of musical intelligence; and it will contain a record of the most interesting events, original articles on important musical subjects by eminent writers, notices, reviews, a correspondence column, humorous and other anecdotes, and criticism of Concerts, the Drama, &c., &c.

Each number will contain an original part-song, duet, or other vocal composition, by a well-known composer, and the proprietors have the gratification of informing their patrons that a Musical Novel, by Mrs. Diehl (author of "The Garden of Eden" &c., &c.), will commence in the first number, an interesting paper on "Literature of the Piano-forte," by Mr. Walter Macfarren, "A History of Harmony and Counterpoint," by Mr. Carl Mangold, and an important paper by Mr. W. H. Cummings will appear.

The First Number of "Musical Society" will have a guaranteed circulation of 5,000 copies; advertisers will therefore find it an excellent medium for extending their professional and business operations. Scale of charges on application. The space for advertisements being limited, orders should be sent at once for insertion in the first number.

FRANZ LISZT.

NEXT April—so runs the announcement—Franz Liszt will be present at the performance of his "Holy Elisabeth" at St. James's Hall. It would be difficult to name a musician around whom centres greater fame and interest. The triumphant successes of the king of pianists in all the capitals of Europe, nearly half a century ago, belong to the past; one reads in books how, once upon a time, an extraordinary genius astonished the world by his almost superhuman tours de force, and in evidence thereof one can gaze on those operatic fantasias filled with terrible scales in octaves and even tenths, with chords fit for a giant, wide-sweeping arpeggios, long shakes and other difficulties; and soon one will be able to look at the very hands which worked such wonders. We are speaking of half a century ago. But Liszt was in England even earlier, playing at the court of George IV., and giving public Concerts. The date of his first appearance in London was June 21, 1824. Among the audience were Clementi, Cramer, Kalkbrenner, and Potter. He played a Concerto by Hummel, and improvised a fugue on Zitti-Zitti from "Il Barbiere," named by a lady among the audience. "Master Liszt" came again to England in 1825 and 1827. The programme of a Concert at the Theatre Royal, Manchester, on June 16, 1825, in which he took part is, in its way, a curiosity. We give part of it:—

Messrs. Ward and Andrews have great pleasure in announcing that they have succeeded (at a great expense) in engaging

MASTER LISZT,

Now only twelve years old,

Who is allowed by all those that have witnessed his astonishing talents to be the greatest performer of the present day on the

PIANOFORTE.

The Concert will commence with the highly celebrated

OVERTURE to "DER FREISCHÜTZ,"

Composed by C. M. von Weber,

Which received the most decided marks of approbation at Mr. Hughes's Concert on Monday evening last.

Weber's Overture no longer needs so flattering a recommendation; but by their enthusiasm the good people who attended Mr. Hughes's Concert have found a place in history. To have been fêted by kings and queens, applauded, nay, idolised by the public, praised by the press, admired by men and women themselves distinguished in art and literature, all this would have satisfied most pianists; but Liszt, despising ephemeral glory, however great, sought to make unto himself a name as composer. With regard to the merit of his works, opinions differ. We do not refer to the thousand-and-one Études, transcriptions, and short pieces for the piano, but to the productions of his riper—we may perhaps say, ripest—years. In this country Liszt's principal orchestral works have been heard—the "Dante" and "Faust" Symphonies, nine of the twelve Symphonic Poems, and some of the Marches; but not his Masses and Oratorios, compositions to which, we believe, he attaches the highest value. There are four Masses, besides a Requiem for men's voices, and three Oratorios. So far as we are aware, not one of the Masses has been given, while the "Holy Elisabeth" has been performed once under the direction of Mr. W. Bache, and once, we believe, under that of Dr. Wylde; and only short fragments from the "Christus" have been heard at Philharmonic and Richter Concerts. Why, it may be asked, is the public so indifferent to Liszt? It is an easy question to ask, but not an easy one to answer. Public taste, in this country, has much improved during the last twenty, nay even ten, years. The Choral Symphony is no longer a mystery, something which passeth understanding; novelties no longer drive away the public, but rather draw them; and a still more striking proof of that improvement may be seen in the speedy recognition of Dvorák's genius and in the hearty receptions given to him when he visited England in 1884 and 1885. It is, therefore, curious to compare the attention which has been paid of late to Berlioz and to Wagner in this country with the lack of attention which has been paid to their contemporary Liszt. It may, perhaps, result from the fact that Liszt has had few heralds to proclaim his cause, and still fewer champions to defend it.

Mr. Walter Bache, it is true, has worked faithfully for many years in this country for his master. To him we are mainly indebted for our knowledge of Liszt's orchestral compositions. It required no small courage and perseverance to carry on a work demanding both time and money; for the general public showed itself indifferent, and the critics, for the most part, showed themselves hostile. Many have admired Mr. Bache's enthusiasm and self-sacrifice, but no one has been bold enough to imitate his example; so that he stands alone, and is, as it were, a voice crying in the wilderness. The difficulties against which he has had to contend have probably kept him from revealing to us the Masses and the "Christus" Oratorio. Matters stood somewhat differently with Wagner. He had many heralds, and more than one champion, and yet everyone knows how slowly his cause progressed. And, in his case, he had a great power fighting for him—the power of the pen. His own trenchant writings excited friends and foes to literary efforts, and there sprang up a mass of books, pamphlets, and articles which, whether laudatory or the reverse, served to bring Wagner's name prominently before the public. Liszt especially distinguished himself by his commentaries and expositions of two of the master's works. Liszt's compositions, new in form and treatment, seem to require aids of a similar kind. Schumann and Brahms would probably have still remained comparative strangers to us but for the persistent efforts of Mr. Manns, Mr. A. Chappell, and others to make known their music. The turn of Liszt may come, and if so the public will then be able to pronounce judgment. It may perhaps be found that Liszt, like Berlioz, has been unjustly neglected. A few years ago but little attention was paid to the music of the latter; now the "Faust" is a popular work. In 1881 the Symphonie Fantastique was performed for the first time in London, and has since become an attraction; yet it was composed more than fifty years ago. If a similar success is in store for Liszt, let us hope that he may live to see it. It is well that the genius of Berlioz has at length been fully acknowledged: it would have been better for the composer and for musical art had this acknowledgment been made whilst he was still amongst us.

"There is an instinctive tendency in men to look at any man who has become distinguished," says Cooper in one of his novels. And Franz Liszt, quite apart from his fame as a pianist, or reputation as a composer, has become distinguished from the fact of his having known all the musicians of any importance who have lived in the nineteenth century, and of having been on terms of intimate acquaintance with some of the most famous. In early youth he saw the mighty Bonn master, played before him—nay, more, received from him a kiss. In Paris he made the acquaintance of Hector Berlioz, heard his Symphonie Fantastique at a Concert, and, as the composer tells us in his "Mémoires," excited general attention by his aplomb and enthusiasm. This was the beginning of a friendship between two kindred spirits which lasted for many years. Liszt's remarkable transcription of the Symphonie Fantastique, and other of Berlioz's works for piano, the articles which he wrote about him in the Neue Zeitschrift für Musik, and the revival of "Benvenuto Cellini" at Weimar, show how true and strong that friendship was. Then he knew Frederic Chopin, and he took the liveliest interest in the compositions and playing of the Polish composer. As with Berlioz, so with Chopin: he wrote about him. His monograph, "Frederic Chopin," written at Weimar in 1849, bears testimony to the influence exercised over him by the genius whose death he was then lamenting.

But his long and lasting friendship for Wagner is, perhaps, the most striking. Liszt made his acquaintance in Paris, about the year 1840, and from that time down to the master's death in 1883 he strove with all his might to aid and honour him. "Tannhäuser" was given under Liszt's direction at Weimar in 1849, and it was through his personal exertions that "Lohengrin" was first brought to a hearing there on August 28, 1850. Of his enthusiasm for Wagner's art work, his brochure "Lohengrin and Tannhäuser" gives marked proof. His admiration for Wagner was ever on the increase. In a letter written to Dr. Galle in 1857, he says:—"I am with Wagner all day long; his 'Nibelungen' music is a glorious new work which I have long wished to know. Some day the coolest persons will grow enthusiastic about it." And of "Parsifal" he wrote, twenty-five years later—"Wagner a fait un nouveau miracle." We have mentioned three of the most illustrious artists; to name all would necessitate almost a complete list of nineteenth century musical notabilities.

The approaching visit of the venerable Abbé to London will be, therefore, an event of exceptional interest, and all musicians will be glad to see and welcome a man so noted and so notable. Franz Liszt is an uncommon hero, and will meet with a reception worthy of his name and reputation.

WAGNER ON BELLINI.

STUDENTS of Wagner must often have been surprised to hear it stated, especially by his detractors, that at one time of his life Wagner was lost in admiration for the Italian, Bellini. To a great extent the justice of this accusation has been confirmed by the fact that an article of Wagner's, which reads almost like a "confession of faith," has recently been brought to light and reprinted in the Bayreuther Blätter. The said article appeared in No. 4,621 of the Riga Zuschauer for Tuesday, 7—19 December, 1837, at which date Wagner held the post of Conductor at the Riga Theatre. It was written preparatory to a performance of Bellini's "Norma," which was given for Wagner's "benefit," and presumably for the first time in that place. Rendered into English, it stands as follows:—

BELLINI (Ob. 1835).

"Bellini's music—i.e., Bellini's vocal melody—has of late excited so much attention, and kindled so much enthusiasm, even in Germany, the land of the learned, that a closer examination of this phenomenon seems well worth making. That in Italy and France Bellini's melody is found to be charming, is plain and natural; for in Italy and France one hears with the ears, a fact which has led to the use of such phrases as 'ear-tickling' ('Ohrenkitzel'), &c.—presumably in contradistinction to the 'eye-itching'

('Augenjucken'), which, e.g., the reading of the scores of so many new German Operas gives rise to; but that even the German musical connoisseur has removed his spectacles from off his wearied eyes, and for once has freely given himself up to the charms of beautiful melody, enables us to look deeper into his heart as it really is, and there we find so deep and fervent a longing for the opportunity of taking a full and powerful breath, in order that he may at once feel himself at ease, and be able to rid himself of all the mass of prejudice and mistaken erudition which have so long constrained him to be a German musical connoisseur, and instead of this at last to become a man, fresh, free, and endowed to the full with the glorious capability of being impressed by the beautiful in whatever form it may present itself. But in truth, how seldom is it that we are really convinced by our silly store of fancies and prejudices! How often has it happened to us that we have been charmed with the performance of an Italian or French Opera, and on leaving the theatre have scoffingly indulged in sorry jokes at the excitement we have felt, and on reaching home have been conscience smitten that we ought to guard ourselves against being too easily excited! But if for once we abstain from joking on such a subject, and leave our conscience to take care of itself, and at the same time have a clear conception as to what it is that had just charmed us, we come to the conclusion that, especially in the case of Bellini, it was his pure melody, his simple, noble, and beautiful cantilena which we have found so charming. To observe this and pin our faith upon it is indeed no crime; nor, perhaps, is it even a crime, on going to bed, to offer up a prayer to heaven that equally beautiful melodies and as excellent a mode of treating vocal art may at last be vouchsafed to German composers—melody, melody, and again I say melody, ye Germans! Melody is in short the language in which a man should impart his musical thoughts to others, and if this be not as independently constructed and conserved as every other cultivated language should be, how shall he make himself understood? For the rest, it stands to reason that every one of your village schoolmasters can improve upon what is bad about this Bellini. It is, however, quite beside the question that we should make merry over his shortcomings, for had Bellini gone to a German village schoolmaster for instruction, he would no doubt have learnt better, but whether, at the same time, he would not have had to unlearn much of his art of song, is undoubtedly much to be feared. Further, if we leave to this fortunate Bellini the peculiar pattern of his musical compositions, which is usual with all Italians, the crescendos which invariably follow the theme, the tutti, cadenzas, and such like stereotyped tricks, at which we often so fiercely rail, we find that these are no more than the fixed forms, beyond which the Italian does not go, and which in many respects are by no means so objectionable. If we consider the boundless want of order, the confusion of form, of construction, and modulation, which we meet with in the works of so many new German opera composers, and which so often spoil our enjoyment of many individual points of beauty, we might often well express a wish that this tangled skein might be unravelled by means of this fixed Italian form. And in point of fact the immediately clear conception of all the different phases of emotion will be made much more easy on the stage, if, together with all the feelings and sensations with which it is associated, it all at once be compressed within the scope of a single, clear, and intelligible melody, than if, after a hundred little disquisitions on this or that nuance, and the employment of this or that instrument, it be used up, and in the end entirely reasoned away.

"But to what an extent Italians in their degeneracy still turn to account, especially in the case of certain operatic subjects, a very restricted form abounding in empty flourishes and mannerisms, is evidenced by Bellini in his 'Norma,' unquestionably his most successful composition:—Here, where the poem rises to the tragic height of the ancient Greeks, this kind of form, which Bellini has certainly ennobled, serves only to increase the solemn and imposing character of the whole; all the phases of passion, which are rendered in so peculiarly clear a light by his art of song, are thereby made to rest upon a majestic soil and ground, above which they do not vaguely flutter about, but resolve themselves into a grand and manifest picture, which involuntarily calls to mind the creations of Gluck and Spontini.

"Bellini's Operas have been received with open arms and without opposition in Italy, France, and Germany; is there any reason then why they should not also be similarly treated in Livonia?—O. [RICHARD WAGNER]."

On a first reading of the above article, which is highly suggestive of comment and reflection, many, especially those who have commenced their Wagner studies at the wrong end—viz., with "Parsifal" and the "Ring des Nibelungen," and have not followed them up by instituting a critical examination of the master's career from its very beginning—will probably be inclined to throw it aside as a newspaper puff, penned simply with a view to calling attention to the performance of "Norma," about to be given "for his benefit." That it was written in all sincerity appears not only from Wagner's antecedents and position towards musical art prior to the time of writing, but also to the fact that up to a later period of his life he still believed in Bellini, and held him up as an ensample of melodiousness. This will be made clear if we take a brief glance at Wagner's career prior to his undertaking the conductorship of the theatre at Riga, and follow this up by recounting a few words which he delivered himself of at a later period, and which apparently have not been made public.

At Leipzig, both as a schoolboy and as a student of the University, Wagner applied himself far more assiduously to the study of music, in which he was regularly instructed by Gottlieb Müller and Theodor Weinlig, than to the requirements of either School or University. The result was the composition of a symphony and various other works, both musical and literary, which are duly set forth in the masterly article contributed by Mr. Dannreuther to the "Dictionary of Music and Musicians," edited by Sir George Grove. Of all the music he heard during this period at the Gewandhaus Concerts, he was most deeply impressed with Beethoven's symphonies. As Heinrich Dorn has related of him, there probably was never a young musician who knew Beethoven's works more thoroughly than Wagner did in his eighteenth year. He had copied out for himself the scores of the most important of Beethoven's instrumental works. "He went to bed," says Dorn, "with the quartets, he sang the songs, and whistled the concertos (for his pianoforte-playing was never of the best); in short, he was possessed with a furor Teutonicus, which, added to a good education and a rare mental activity, promised to bring forth rich fruit."

During his first professional engagement—viz., as chorus-master of the Theatre at Würzburg (1833)—Wagner found time to write both words and music of an opera in three acts, "Die Feen," taking for his models (as he has himself related) Beethoven, Weber, and Marschner. Returning to Leipzig in the spring of 1834, he came under the influence of the celebrated actress and singer, Wilhelmine Schröder-Devrient, whose playing of the part of Romeo in Bellini's "Montecchi e Capuletti" profoundly impressed him. Soon afterwards he heard Auber's "La Muette de Portici" ("Masaniello"). These two events set him thinking. And here we cannot do better than quote Mr. Dannreuther's words from the article already alluded to:—"He was ambitious, and longed for an immediate and palpable success;—could he not take hints from Bellini and Auber, and endeavour to combine the merits of their work? Heroic music in Beethoven's manner was the beau-ideal; but it seemed doubtful whether anything approaching it could be attained in connection with the stage. The cases before him showed that effective music can certainly be produced on different lines, and on a lower level; the desiderata, as far as he then saw them, were to contrive a play with rapid and animated action; to compose music that would not be difficult to sing, and would be likely to catch the ear of the public." The result was "Das Liebesverbot," an opera in two acts, after Shakespeare's "Measure for Measure," the music of which (says Mr. Dannreuther)* is curiously unlike his former models, and it is easy to trace in it the influence of "La Muette," and even of "Il Pirata" and "Norma."

From the Autumn of 1834 to the Spring of 1836 Wagner resided at Magdeburg, where he gave concerts and conducted at the theatre. At the concerts, his overtures to "Die Feen" and Apel's play "Columbus" were performed, and he wrote a Cantata for New Year's Day, and music to a farce, "Der Bergegeist," &c. At the theatre, where in spite of a subvention from the Court of Saxony, the manager, Herr Bethmann, was in a chronic state of impending bankruptcy, matters were far from satisfactory. As a final stroke, his opera "Das Liebesverbot" was hastily put upon the stage and proved an utter failure.

All attempts to secure the production of the work in Leipzig and Berlin having proved of no avail, he accepted the conductorship of the theatre in Königsberg, where, he says, "I wasted a year amid petty cares, worrying myself and others. An overture, 'Rule Britannia,' is the only thing I wrote." As at Magdeburg, so again here, the bankruptcy of the manager of the theatre terminated his engagement.

The following year (1837) found him fulfilling a similar engagement at Riga, where the performance of "Norma," which has given rise to these remarks, was performed on the 13th of December.

Now, to pass over to a later period of the master's life. It was in May, 1872, that a goodly company of musicians assembled at Bayreuth on the memorable occasion of the laying the first stone of the Festival Theatre. Wagner was just then greatly elated at the success which "Lohengrin" had recently met with in Italy. In the course of conversation, he asked: "Do you know why this was so? It was due to its melodious character, which the Italians readily recognised—You young Germans do not know what true melody is—You have not learned from Bellini, as I have done."

We now, therefore, stand face to face with the fact, on Wagner's own showing, that the protoplasm of some portion of the charm of his music is to be found in the Italian style of its melody, e.g., that of Spontini and Bellini. So astounding a proposition as this must appear to many, is not however difficult to reconcile, if we turn to "Kienzi," the earliest of his operas, which is accessible to all. Here we certainly find that the general cut of the melodies is far more in accordance with Italian and French than with German precedent. In his subsequent works this is less easy to trace, for Wagner made such gigantic strides from one opera to another, remodelling the style of each in accordance with its poetical and dramatic requirements, that, much as Wagner prided himself on being a German of the Germans, it is impossible to characterise any one of his later works as being specifically German, or indeed as anything else but—Wagner. But after all, of all the many constituents which together go to make up the complex of a Wagner Opera, is it not principally due to the melodiousness—we will not say the set tunes, for these are few and far between—by which each is pervaded, that Wagner's music has gained so strong a hold upon the public ear?

To draw a moral from the above: we should not forget that, though we may rejoice at the death of Italian Opera as a thing of the past of which we have long been weary, we still owe something to it; and we shall not be doing amiss if, taking the hint from Wagner, we join in praying that it may be given to every composer to write in as beautifully a melodious vein as Bellini, or—as he did.

CHARLES DIBDIN (1745—1814).

[THE substance of a lecture read at the London Institution on January 14, by Mr. W. A. Barrett.]

The name of Charles Dibdin was at one time the best known among musical writers, and his songs were, in their day, the most popular of any that were written. The charm of spontaneous melody which they all possessed commended them at once to those who heard them, and secured for many of them a favour which has not even now entirely lost its hold. Some of his songs have become as it were national, and find their way into every collection designed for general acceptance. As in many instances they are printed without the author's name, numbers of those who sing them are ignorant of the source whence they sprang.

Those who have given the least attention to the perusal of his multitudinous works admit that he was a most prolific writer, while others who have studied him carefully discern many of the marks of genius in his productions. At the same time, they cannot conceal from themselves that he was wanting in the mental training which would have made him on the one hand a respectable musician, and on the other a refined poet. All his works are the outcome of native genius, undeveloped by study or labour. He wrote as birds sing, by the light of nature. The power with which he was gifted was a recognisable quality to human intelligence, and so his songs rarely appeal in vain for recognition. They are thoroughly English. They are plain-spoken, straightforward, honest, and manly, even if all these qualities are to be traced through the course of a diction which in many instances belongs to the lower order of the people as it existed a century back. There is often a spark of true poetry in his verses, though his rhymes are faulty and his rhythm occasionally erratic.

His facility in composition was not attained by careful study and labour, but was the outcome of extraordinary natural power, unassisted by any science but that derived from personal experience.

When he had nearly reached his sixtieth year he wrote an amusing account of his professional life, and furnished his readers with a number of particulars concerning his career, which are especially interesting, but they are mostly of a kind calculated to give an insight into his social peculiarities, rather than to show the stages of his mental development. Without perhaps intending to be so, he is extremely vague about certain portions of his life, which now would have the greatest attraction for the admirers of his genius, that is to say, those incidents in his career more particularly connected with musical associations.

He was born in Southampton on the 13th March, 1745. His father, who was a silversmith, had a very numerous family. Charles was his eighteenth child. It is said that he was intended for the Church, and for the furtherance of this object that he was sent to Winchester College. The Registers of the College have been searched recently by the Warden, and there is no trace of Dibdin's name on the books.

A like investigation made by the present Dean of the Cathedral discloses the fact that Charles Dibdin was admitted Junior Chorister in June, 1756, and all mention of his name drops out of the records after November, 1759. These facts, which have not been cleared up until now, admit of Dibdin's name being added to the list of illustrious Cathedral choristers. He had a beautiful voice, and James Kent, at that time organist of the College and of the Cathedral, wrote one or two of his famous treble anthems for him; he was greatly petted for his singing, and perhaps became a little wayward as is the wont of spoiled boys. In his memoirs he asserts that Kent taught him nothing of the science of music, but trusted to the quickness and accuracy of his ear. Such instruction in the rudiments which he gained he owed to Peter Fussell, at that time Kent's assistant, and ultimately his successor. As the "chief vocal performer at a weekly concert in Winchester," he gained considerable popularity. Carried away by his present success, which he dreamed would be permanent, he resolved to make music his profession. He learned to play the harpsichord a little, and applied for the post of organist at North Waltham, near Basingstoke, but "was rejected," as he says, "on account of his youth." Those who knew him, however, say that he was scarcely qualified for the post.

His brother Tom, many years older than himself, the captain of an Indian merchantman, at this time had returned from a voyage, and invited the boy to London, where he promised to provide for him, and to further his interests. With this view he obtained for him a situation in the house of Johnson, a celebrated music publisher in Cheapside, where he was employed in "screwing-up harpsichords, at a salary of nothing a week, and find himself."

His distresses were augmented in a cruel way; his brother, having gone to sea, was taken prisoner by a French man-of-war, and he was literally left to his own resources. He wrote some songs and pieces for the harpsichord, which he offered to his master, who refused them contemptuously. Another publisher, Thompson, of St. Paul's Churchyard, was more considerate. He gave the lad three guineas for six songs, which were published at three-halfpence each. These brought him a little to the notice of a few people, who patronised him because he was clever and amusing, but, refusing to be funny at command, they neglected him, and finally dropped him. One friend he had, a Mr. Beranger, who introduced him to Christopher Rich, the manager of Covent Garden Theatre, and by him he was employed as a chorus singer. John Beard, the famous tenor singer of Handel's time, who succeeded his father-in-law, Rich, as proprietor of Covent Garden, discovered the talents of young Dibdin, and believing that his extraordinary power of melody would produce a good effect upon the public, got him to write the words and music of a little pastoral drama called

"The Shepherd's Artifice," which was produced on May 21, 1762, for the author's benefit, he having only just turned his seventeenth year. In this he played the part of Strephon, his first appearance on the stage in London. He had made his début at Richmond a few months before. There are twelve pieces in this little work, the most famous of which is the song "In every fertile valley," which was the first attempt at composition made by our young author.

The regularity of the air is, perhaps, due to the fact that it was an imitation of the style of Dr. Arne. Originality it had little, for all the phrases were the common property of the writers of the day. However, the song was much liked, and brought the composer so well before the public, that when he made a fresh appearance as a musical actor, as Ralph in the Burletta of the "Maid of the Mill," he was received with the greatest applause, and his acting contributed in no small degree to the success of the piece. His popularity in this Opera was very great; handkerchiefs of the peculiar pattern worn by him in the character became fashionable, and were called "Ralphs," just as in later years "Belchers" were so named in compliment to a famous prize-fighter.

He continued as an actor and singer on the stage for four or five years, without producing any new work of importance. He was a popular vocalist at Ranelagh and Vauxhall, and was satisfied apparently with his reputation as a singer and song-writer.

His next compositions for the stage were "Love in the City," afterwards altered into "The Romp," and a part of the music of "Lionel and Clarissa." For "The Padlock," a play written by Isaac Bickerstaffe from a Spanish original, he wrote the whole of the music, including the overture. In this he performed the part of Mungo, a negro servant, and his success was even greater than that which he had won as Ralph. "The Padlock" was produced at Drury Lane in 1768. Yet notwithstanding the favour with which he was received in the double capacity of composer and actor, he meditated retiring from the stage, because, as he says, "he had found the theatrical career a fruitful source of heart-burnings and disputes." But when a man is constantly complaining of the usage he receives from others, we may be assured that the greater part of the blame rests with himself. Most of Dibdin's biographers, however properly enthusiastic they may be about his productions, have little to say concerning his capacity for business. The like indifference to his own pecuniary advantages may be seen in his want of observance of moral proprieties. The cause of his leaving the stage arose from his utter disregard of those principles of virtue which form the salient features of many of his beautiful songs. It was of him that the well-known comparison was made, when it was said that he was like the finger-post, which pointed out the way he never went himself.

He had formed an association with Miss Pitt, known by the stage name of Mrs. Davenet, and had a large family by her, while his first wife was yet living. Having deserted Mrs. Davenet and her children, Garrick took up the cause of the unhappy woman, who was reduced to poverty by this treatment, and procured Dibdin's discharge from Covent Garden Theatre. He formed another connection of a similar kind with a Miss Wild, with whom he lived until the death of his wife enabled him to marry her.

Dibdin's untiring industry and fecundity date from the time when he left the stage. It has already been pointed out that Dibdin was careless of his own interests. This was shown in the instance of "The Padlock," the work in which his powers of melody were exhibited to such advantage that they secured the success of the piece. The author of the words, Bickerstaffe, kept the copyright in his own hands, and cleared £1,700 by his foresight. All that Dibdin obtained for his music was £45. The literary partnership of these two authors, which commenced with "Love in the City," was continued until "The Ephesian Matron" and "The Brick-dust Man" were produced, in 1769 and 1772 respectively.

A piece called "The Wedding Ring," which was brought out anonymously in the latter year, was written by himself entirely. His "enemies" ascribed it to Bickerstaffe, who was an officer of marines and was dismissed the service under circumstances dishonourable to him. Dibdin was compelled to publish a series of affidavits in the public prints and to appear on the stage and declare himself the author before it was allowed to proceed. It enjoyed a fair measure of success, and the music was published, but he gained nothing by it.

He now wrote the words and music of several pieces, such as "The Mischance," "The Grenadier," "The Ladle," "England against Italy," "None so blind as those who won't see," for Sadler's Wells; "The trip to Portsmouth" for the Haymarket; "The Deserter" and the "Masque in Amphitryon" for Drury Lane, all produced in the year 1773. The number and variety of the ideas in these works proved his extraordinary facility in composition; but, with the exception of "The Wedding Ring," they all fell more or less flat with the public. He revived his popularity in the following years by the production of "The Waterman" at the Haymarket (1774), and "The Quaker" at Drury Lane (May 3, 1775). "The Waterman" was sold for £30 to a publisher; "The Quaker," to Breton, the actor, for £70, who disposed of it to Garrick for a hundred. Both these ballad operas have kept the stage to the present day, and more than one of the songs out of each have become national.

A little piece called "The Cobbler; or, a Wife of Ten Thousand," taken from "Blaise le Savetier" of Sedaine, preceded "The Quaker" at Drury Lane, but achieved only a small measure of success.

"The trip to Portsmouth," performed at the Haymarket in 1773, contains the first of the sea-songs ever written by Dibdin—one that is still popular, namely "Bustle, bustle, drink about, and let us merry be." The overture and dances in this were written by Dr. Arne.

Other pieces for Sadler's Wells and the Haymarket, of a light and trivial character, flowed from his fertile pen, and in 1776 (November 14) "The Seraglio" (the same subject as Mozart's "Die Entführung aus dem Serail") was first acted at Covent Garden. In this piece occurs the fine song "Blow high, blow low," which some assert to be the first of Dibdin's sea-songs. It was written, he tells us, "in a gale of wind on a thirteen hours' passage from Calais," on his return from France, whither he had been on a visit for a few months. "It arose," he states, "out of reflections that I was on my return to her who has since lent inspiration to so many similar sentiments, of which this was a specimen."

"The Vineyard Revels," "She is mad for a husband," "Yeo, yeo, or the Ready Tars," for Sadler's Wells, "The Old Woman of Eighty" and "The Razor Grinder," in 1777, were followed by "Poor Vulcan," brought out at Covent Garden, February 4, 1778. This was either the first production arising out of his engagement in that year as composer to the theatre at a salary of £10 per week, or, as it is asserted, was the means by which the arrangement was brought about.

Dibdin wrote the words of a piece called "The Gipsies," which was set to music by Dr. Arne and produced at the Haymarket in 1778, the only instance in which his own words were set by another composer. He had written music for other men's words before, but, until then, had never furnished words for other men's music.

The libretto was composed in France during his visit to that country, and other ideas he had imbibed during his short stay he brought to a practical use in his next piece for Covent Garden, "Rose and Colin," which was acted on September 18, 1778. In this he made the first attempt to introduce on the English stage a taste for the French Vaudeville. This was followed by "Wives revenged," and "Annette and Lubin" in the same style.

"The Touchstone," which he called a speaking pantomime, acted in 1779, was the means of bringing about a reconciliation between Dibdin and Garrick. "The last time that eminent actor was ever on the stage was during an evening repetition of 'The Touchstone,' a night or two before its performance. The next morning he left town for Lord Spencer's, and returned in a few days to breathe his last in the Adelphi."

"The Chelsea Pensioners," a few songs for the pantomime of "The Mirror; or, Harlequin Everywhere," formed the rest of his labours in 1779, and on January 18, in the following year, "The Shepherdess of the Alps," a comic opera containing some of his best music, was produced and failed. The principal tenor was Vernon, a very popular singer, who did not even trouble himself to learn his part, and being remonstrated with by the author, he coolly said that as he saw that it was the general wish that the piece should be damned, he did his best to lend it a helping hand.

A musical dialogue, "The Fortune Hunter," written for Sadler's Wells in 1780; "The Islanders," afterwards compressed into a piece called "The Marriage Act," and "Harlequin Freemason," for Covent Garden, with two entertainments called "Reasonable Animals" and "Pandora," performed by puppets of the Haymarket Theatre, were the labours of the rest of this year.

About this time (1780) his brother Tom died, leaving an infant son, afterwards the famous bibliographer, the Rev. T. F. Dibdin, and Charles wrote the immortal song "Tom Bowling" (which he called "The Sailor's Epitaph") in his memory. He had in this year terminated his connection with Covent Garden once more, and made one or two attempts to carry on theatrical business on his own account.

These do not seem to have been attended with all the success expected. He built a theatre called the "Circus," on the site of the present Surrey Theatre, and comforted himself with bright hopes of prosperity. He was appointed manager for life, and the guiding plan of the scheme was to effect a combination of musical entertainments with equestrian performances. He entered upon his duties with unwonted activity. The theatre was finished in 1782, and in the course of that year he produced no less than eighteen pieces, all his own. But, according to his account, his designs were thwarted and his schemes defeated by the machinations of his enemies once more, and at the end of three years he retired in disgust, almost penniless through strifes at law. His enterprising spirit was not however crushed, for he began to build another theatre out in the fields beyond St. Pancras Church, in the North of London. This, which he intended should be called "The Helicon," was far advanced when the license was refused, and a violent gale of wind threw down the whole structure, and no attempt was made to rebuild it.

He abandoned his hopes of becoming a theatrical manager, with a theatre of his own, and once more resolved to live by his pen alone. For this purpose he entered into a contract to furnish the manager of the Dublin Theatre with musical pieces. There is a difficulty in verifying the list of works he produced for this purpose. He tells us in his "Musical Tour" that the manager owed him £600 for his labours, out of which he only got £140. So history repeats itself. In 1787 he wrote "Harvest Home" for the Haymarket Theatre, and this was the last work he furnished for the stage, except the unsuccessful piece "The Round Robin," written for the Haymarket Theatre in 1811. His attention was turned to other matters, none of which, however, brought him the fortune he earnestly desired to make. Failure after failure dogged his steps, yet he worked on, "Strong in hope though poor in pocket."

One cannot but admire the elasticity and greatness of his spirit in the midst of difficulties. He started a weekly periodical called The Devil. This at first had a great sale, for people were anxious about that good gentleman's opinions, and hope seemed to be dawning on bright and prosperous days. After the twenty-first number the publication collapsed, "The Devil was dead, and all was over." He now resolved to turn his back upon his country, and seek his fortune in a land where only his genius would be known, and the relentless hatred of his enemies would be short-armed and powerless to reach him. His brother Tom had resided a long time in India, and many of his creditors and friends were still there. They would pay the debts due to him as his brother's executor, and perhaps be disposed to receive him with favour for his own talents, and thus he would make his fortune. He raised money for the voyage by devising a series of monologue entertainments, the first of the kind ever attempted. In many places, however, he was looked upon as an impostor who had assumed the name of the great Mr. Dibdin, for the purpose of cheating the public in a novel manner. He met with sufficient success in different parts of the country to furnish him with a nucleus of the funds he required for his journey. He published an amusing, but slightly self-laudatory, account of his musical tour in 1788, with the name of the Prince of Wales—to whom the work is inscribed, "With pride of heart, humble deference, and grateful susceptibility"—at the head of a list of 600 subscribers. With the money derived from this, and from the sale of certain of his musical copyrights, in which he most certainly suffered at the hands of the publishers, who took advantage of his necessities, he set out. "My Poll and my partner Joe" went for two guineas; "Nothing like grog" for ten-and-sixpence, and other popular songs in proportion.

He sailed for India in 1788, but the ship was caught in a violent storm in the Plymouth Roads and driven into Torbay. Dibdin landed, abandoned the idea of going to India, and never set foot on board ship again.

It is not a little singular that he, whose songs helped to man the British Navy with enthusiastic sailors, and whose lyrics, it is said, have been quoted on the deck of a man of war, in order to help to quell a mutiny, should only have been at sea twice or thrice in his life; first, when he went over to France, secondly, when he crossed to Dublin, and next when he made his attempt to get to India.

When he landed at Torbay from the Indiaman, he wrote a musical lecture, the first of a series which he delivered in several towns on his way back to London. It was for these that the majority of his immortal sea-songs were written. "The whim of the Moment," the first of these entertainments, was produced at first in Torbay, and afterwards in London at Hutchin's Auction Rooms, in King Street, Covent Garden. It was not successful at first, and twelve of the songs which he had published on his own account having no sale, he disposed of them for £60 to a publisher. One of the songs was "Poor Jack," which is even now so popular that the words which occur as a refrain, "They say there's a Providence sits up aloft to keep watch for the life of Poor Jack," form a stock phrase in the English language.

His next entertainment, "The Oddities," produced at the Lyceum, was more successful. His popularity continuing, he remained in that place for two seasons, and then removed, in 1791, to the Polygraphic rooms, opposite Beaufort Buildings, in the Strand, on the site partly occupied by Exeter Street. This place he fitted up expressly for his purpose, and called it "Sans Souci." As he received a large share of public patronage, the following epigram was written:—

What more conviction need there be
That Dibdin's plan will do,
Since now we find him Sans Souci,
Who late was sans six-sous.

Here he enjoyed uninterrupted success for five years, when he built a new theatre in Leicester Place in 1796, which he also called "Sans Souci," in commemoration of the prosperity the name had brought him.

He continued to give his entertainments here until 1805, when he sold his theatre, retired to Cranford, near Staines, and disposed of all his copyrights to Bland and Weller, the publishers, for £1,800, with an allowance of £100 a year for all he might produce for three years. He had been granted a pension from the government of £200 per annum in 1803, in consideration of the value of his songs, and their importance in keeping up the spirit of the navy. This pension was withdrawn in 1808 by the Grenville administration. Notwithstanding the fact that he had made large sums of money, not only in London but in the provinces, he had been unable to save anything; he therefore was compelled to resume his professional duties. He performed at the Lyceum for two years, giving three new entertainments, with the help of several additional singers. He also opened a music-shop opposite the theatre; but all his endeavours were futile, and ended in failure and bankruptcy.

A sum of £640 was collected for him at a banquet at the London Tavern, on April 12, 1810, and invested in the purchase of an annuity, with reversion to his wife and daughter.

He died, after a paralytic stroke, at Arlington Street, Camden Town, on July 25, 1814, aged 69. He was interred in the burial ground at Camden Town, belonging to St. Martin-in-the-Fields, and a stone, inscribed with the words of a portion of his own song, was placed over his remains:—

His form was of the manliest beauty;
His heart was kind and soft;
Faithful below, he did his duty,
But now he's gone aloft.

A series of essays might be written concerning the life and works of this extraordinary man of genius. The history of the stage, or the annals of music, afford no parallel to him. Entirely self-taught, he excelled as an actor, as a poet, as a singer, and as a melodist.

It is remarkable that Dibdin should be a standing proof to the contrary that a man's life is reflected in his works. His conduct was totally at variance with the noble principles of love, morality, and affection which are everywhere to be gathered from his poems. These are full of purity of sentiment and generosity of feeling which apparently could only spring from the highest principles of piety and virtue. There is not a single published poem of his which can be said to be either gross or licentious. They do not appear to be mere word effusions, the rhymes of the head, but the true poetry of the heart, dictated by sentiments of religion, benevolence, and morality. It is therefore best to know him through his works, and to pity him for the frailty of a disposition which was contrary to his true nature. He composed, wholly or in part, music and words for more than a hundred pieces and entertainments. The actual number of his songs will never be known. Nearly 1,500 have been printed. He also wrote several works of a miscellaneous character, scarcely worthy of his reputation.

Dibdin's genius shines out with as great a lustre in his music as it does in his poetry. The power of melody he possessed was as varied in its mode of expression as it was rare in its inexhaustible quantity and quality. He tells us that "the music grew with the words," and so it is rare to find any repetition of ideas beyond the characteristic mode of utterance which is each man's peculiarity. He possessed a flow of tunefulness so copious and fresh that it was more easy for him to invent new tunes than to use up his old ones to save trouble. Of the 1,500 songs by him which are known to have been printed, there have been discovered only two having the same melody slightly varied. These are "There was a young maid and her name it was Gillian," one of the songs written and sung by him at Ranelagh, and "The jolly young waterman." This is a fact which is sufficiently remarkable to be noted.

The peculiarity of Dibdin's songs rests in the happy union of "Voice and Verse, Twin-born harmonious Sisters," and the natural freedom of their phrases. Many of the melodies are as pleasing and as new at the distance of a century since they were written, as they were the day they were first set on paper by their author. There is nothing old-fashioned in their style.

They bear the well-known test proposed as a gauge for all perfect melodies by the old masters. They will stand a good bass. This Dibdin rarely was able to furnish himself. Many of his own accompaniments to his songs show his want of science. This can be supplied by modern hands and the songs gain much in beauty. They are like rough but clever sketches which look nothing in the author's portfolio, but when carefully mounted and framed their true beauties are made manifest.

The extended compass of many of the songs is due to the peculiar method with which it was the custom to sing them. The popular form of voice in Dibdin's day was the baritone, with a superstructure of falsetto. Dibdin's own voice was of this character.

Unlike many of the singers of his time, he gave his songs without elaborate vocal ornamentation, but with taste and simple expression. He accompanied himself "with facility and neatness." In his entertainments he employed an instrument "combining the properties of the pianoforte and the chamber organ, and so constructed that the performer could produce the tones of either instrument separately, or of both in combination. To this instrument were attached a set of bells, a side-drum, a tambourine, and a gong, which he could bring into play by various mechanical contrivances, so as to give a pleasing variety to his accompaniments."

There is one fact concerning Dibdin as an accompanist, which is of interest to the musical student. He was the first who played upon the pianoforte in public. On May 16, 1767, at the Theatre Royal, in Covent Garden, "The Beggar's Opera" was played for the benefit of Miss Brickler. A copy of the play-bill, in the possession of Messrs. Broadwood and Sons, informs us at the "end of Act 1, Miss Brickler will sing a favourite song from 'Judith,' accompanied by Mr. Dibdin, on a new instrument, called Piano-forte."

Dibdin desired to pose as a scientific musician, but he did not possess the necessary qualifications. He published a superficial text-book in rhyme, called "The Harmonic Preceptor," and two other books of instruction, "The Musical Mentor" and "Music Epitomised," which are valuable as curiosities connected with him, but for nothing more. He wrote a "History of the Stage," in five volumes, and published his "Professional Life" in 1803, in four volumes. The first shows little research, and the second a fecundity of imagination almost as great as is exhibited in his songs.

His songs will keep his name alive so long as the English language is spoken. They are manly and healthy, their diction is eloquent; their music lends charm to their eloquence, and enforces the emphasis of their meaning. There is nothing mean or vicious in their simple imagery, even if their mode of utterance is cast in common and unpretentious language. Therefore, as long as men have hearts to feel and minds to appreciate, the lyrics of Charles Dibdin will never lose their hold upon the sympathies and affections of Englishmen.

If the distinctions given for valuable services to the country were in all cases impartially distributed according to merit and ability, the name of Dibdin would be inscribed among those whom the nation delighted to honour by titles and rewards. If he had been a foreigner, "fair statues would be gracing" each place associated with his name and artistic career. As he was only an Englishman, his tombstone bears a half-obliterated inscription; and the "national monument" is a simple bust, procured by subscription, placed in an out of the way corner in Greenwich Hospital. There is a portrait of him in the National Portrait Gallery at South Kensington, but beyond these memorials there is nothing to show that the genius of Dibdin has ever received due recognition from his countrymen.

THE FAUST LEGEND, AND ITS MUSICAL TREATMENT BY COMPOSERS

By F. CORDER.

II.

It now becomes our difficult duty to convey some idea of the Second Part of Goethe's great work. Although isolated fragments, notably the concluding scene, had been penned at various times, its actual composition was not begun till four-and-twenty years after the completion of the First Part. Almost inevitably then there could be little in keeping between the two plays; the Goethe of 1830 was a widely different being to the Goethe of thirty years before, and the Faust idea no longer presenting itself to him in the old light, could not be satisfactorily pursued. The second drama is hardly a drama at all, having no unity of time, place, or persons; Faust and Mephistopheles indeed pervade it, the latter character assuming various forms, but otherwise each scene brings a fresh set of personages. The work has been occasionally performed on the stage, and having received musical treatment at the hands of several distinguished composers, a summary of its incidents, incomprehensible as they must seem, becomes necessary.

Act I. shows us Faust asleep in a flowery mead, tended by sylphs of the air, headed by Arlecchino, who with their songs strive to assuage his grief and remorse. As he wakes and observes the glorious sunrise, hope and renewed aspirations return to his wounded breast. This fine scene has been in large part set to music by three composers, Schumann, Pierson, and Lassen, but in each case with little success, though the blame does not rest with the words. The second and succeeding scenes take us to the Court of an Emperor, whither Faust and Mephistopheles repair, as in the old story, to exhibit their powers. Mephistopheles takes the form of the court fool, and offers by the aid of Faust to fill the treasury of the impecunious monarch. After much discussion, in which the Chancellor, the Field Marshal, the Treasurer, the Steward, the Astrologer, and others take part, alternating with a sort of Greek chorus in the form of a murmur of the courtiers, the proposal is accepted, and then follows a Carnival masque. It would only be confusing to attempt any description of this scene, or the multifarious personages in it. The fantastic element is here predominant, pervading even the stage-directions, as may be seen from the following quotation:—

"The Herald announces various poets, the Poet of Nature, Court singers, and Troubadours, tender as well as enthusiastic. In the throng of competitors of every kind, none will allow the others to be heard . . . Poets of the Night and the Tomb send apologies, inasmuch as they are engaged in a most interesting conversation with a newly arisen Vampire, wherefrom a new kind of poetry may perhaps be developed. The Herald is forced to admit the excuse, and meanwhile summons the Greek Mythology, which, though in modern masks, loses neither its character nor charm."

After this masque we find how Faust makes the Emperor rich by the invention of paper money. The effects of this sudden access of wealth to the court are shown with much fine satire. Faust next consults his companion as to the fulfilment of another desire of the Emperor's, to behold Paris and Helen. Mephistopheles, with some reluctance, confides to him the means of doing this. He gives him a magic key which will transport him to a locality known in popular phrase as "the other side of nowhere," which indefinite region is inhabited by a set of mysterious deities called simply the Mothers. These will have to be consulted in the matter, and the "glowing tripod" round which they hover brought back by the adventurer. To enter into an explanation of the real meaning of all the symbolical incidents of this drama, we have said, is beyond our present scope, and, indeed, the reader will probably be quite content to forego such explanations when he finds, from the single specimen which we shall here give, that they only open fresh depths of thought, and involve the matter in more obscurity.

The Mothers then were old Pelasgian Nature-deities, who were superseded by the great goddesses Demeter and Persephone. Their realm was that Field of Truth which lies outside the universe (query, in the Fourth Dimension of space?); they are its imaginary guardians; the conceptions, causes, energies of all created things repose in its mysterious depths, issue thence and are developed in time and space; it is the realm of the infinite as opposed to the finite; of the ideal as opposed to the real. Faust is required to invoke Helen and Paris, in whom he recognises the ideal impersonation of womanly and manly beauty, whose forms had been embodied in Greek art. In order to reproduce them, he must forget the region of actuality and enter that of the Infinite and the Eternal; he must, moreover, realise in the depths of his spiritual consciousness the sentiments and ideas from which they originally sprang. This can only be accomplished by an intense effort of mental abstraction, combined with the patient study of classical antiquity. It is given to creative genius alone to unlock with its glowing key the treasury of the past; to summon thence the spirits of a bygone age, and to breathe into them the breath of life. This intellectual process is typified by Faust's descent to the Mothers. At first he shrinks back appalled from the effort; having, however, at length entered the realm of the invisible, the contemplation of the divine ideal is for him a spiritual new birth. The tripod appears to have a double signification, and to symbolise at the same time the original creative energy subsisting at the heart of things, and also the inspiration of genius, which is alone the source of ideal impersonation.

Has the reader quite grasped this? Then, now, he knows all about it, and we can proceed.

Faust returns from his quest with the tripod and the key, and before the assembled court gives the promised display, causing the shades of Paris and Helena to appear. Here in the frivolous behaviour and remarks of the audience is marked the difference between Faust, the typical seeker after the Ideal, and the common herd, who only look on art as an amusement. Carried away by his enthusiasm Faust strives to grasp the phantom Helena, but the Ideal cannot be attained in this fashion. There is an explosion, and the phantoms vanish while the rash magician is thrown down and injured. Mephistopheles carries him off from the excited court, and so ends the First Act.

Act II. opens in Faust's old chamber, whither he has been transported in a state of insensibility by Mephistopheles. The first scene, in which Mephisto talks metaphysics with several uninteresting personages, may be passed over; we are then introduced to the quondam pupil, Wagner, now a full-blown astrologer, who is busily engaged in manufacturing a human being. Not a ten-foot giant, like Frankenstein's ill-fated monster, but rather a pigmy such as Paracelsus admitted would be all that he could manage to produce—a kind of bottle-imp, in fact, a Homunculus in a crystal vial. The exact significance of this character in the drama has eluded the wisdom of the profoundest analysts of Goethe's riddle; all that is clear is that he is an intelligence striving to attain organic existence. As it is found impossible to restore Faust to health, Homunculus is asked to advise, and he suggests transporting him to the Phalaris fields, where he may enjoy the classical Walpurgis Night—whatever that may be—

Meph. Of such a thing I've never yet heard mention.

Homun. How should these matters call for your attention?

Romantic ghosts alone are in your line;

True phantoms must the classical combine.

which satisfactory explanation decides the matter, and the expedition is undertaken. The remainder of this act, the classical Walpurgis Night, is such a wild chaos of allegory and philosophy as to defy description. The analysts tell us that it represents Faust's passionate striving after the realisation of his ideal, together with the transition from lower to higher forms of being, as manifested more especially in the history of Greek art.* Goethe's own remarks to Eckermann on this subject are equally luminous: "You will perceive that in these earlier scenes the chords of the classic and romantic are constantly struck, so that, as on a rising ground, where both forms of poetry are brought out, and in some sort balance one another, we may ascend to 'Helena,'" The meaning of this sentence is not rendered clearer by its mixed metaphors; it may be perfectly satisfactory to philosophers and poets, but ordinary mortals do not see why the expression of the obscure should necessarily involve obscurity of expression. The "transition from lower to higher forms," which at first appears to mean the development of art, presently refers to the growth of the material world. Sirens sing the praise of water, the primordial element; the earth is upheaved by an earthquake, personified by the giant Seismos; and, after a period of revolution and disorder, the Nereids and Tritons bring on three of the seven Cabiri, or primeval deities, representing the rise and progress of religion. So the poem wanders on from one allegory to another out of all keeping, till the Act culminates in the appearance, over the waves, of the nymph Galatea, against whose throne the glass bottle of Homunculus is shattered, and the ideas which constitute him dispersed far and wide. Let us not pause to bewilder ourselves with all these profundities, but pass rapidly on.

Act III., cast in the mould of a Greek play, introduces us to Helena. Perhaps it will be enough here to say that she and Faust are presently united and reign over the imaginary kingdom of Arcadia. This union is supposed to represent the wedding of classical and mediæval art. The succeeding episode of the marvellous youth Euphron, their son, who perishes in attempting too bold a flight, is supposed to typify the career of the poet Byron, though what in the world Byron had to do with classic or mediæval art we must leave others to say. Here is the incident—

Euph. But lo!—a pair of wings

Away! Aloft! I must—

Stay not my flight.

Chor. Icarus! Icarus!

Misery—woe!

[A beautiful youth falls at his parents' feet; we imagine that we recognise in the dead a well-known form; but the corporeal part quickly vanishes, the æthereal soars like a comet to heaven; dress, mantle, and lyre remain on the ground.]

After, an exquisite lament by the chorus, Helena has a touching little speech:—

Hel. The words of old return to me, alas, in pain:

That joy and beauty never lastingly are linked!

The bond of life is severed with the bond of love;

Bewailing both I bid thee mournfully farewell;

And for the last time throw myself into thine arms.

Persephone, receive the child and mother, both!

[She embraces Faust, her form vanishes, garment and veil alone remaining in his arms. . . .

[Helena's garments dissolve into clouds, they envelope

Faust, raise him aloft, and pass with him from the scene.]

The principal persons having thus departed, the chorus also disperses, with a long speech to the effect that they have now a place in Nature and need therefore never return again to Hades. The stage direction which concludes this act is rather nightmarish, to say the least:—

"The curtain falls. Phorcy's, in the proscenium, rears herself to a gigantic height, descends from the cothurni, lays aside her mask and veil and reveals herself as Mephistopheles, in order, so far as may be necessary, to comment upon the piece in the manner of an epilogue."

Act IV. deals with rather more intelligible matters. Faust, transported from imaginary realms to German soil by Helena's veil, is shown to have advanced in his ideas. No longer contemplating the ideal, like a young enthusiast, he has risen above the stage of mere desire and enjoyment. He seeks a definite, practical aim for his energies; Humanity, not Art, is the true object of life. He proposes to restrain the ocean-tide and wrest from it the land it has swallowed. Mephistopheles' entrance in this scene is preceded by the passing across the stage of a pair of seven-league boots, a rather extravagant way of symbolising the vast distance from Arcadia to prosaic Germany. Next we have a battle scene, wherein Faust assists the Emperor, as in the old legend, to conquer his enemies, turning the tide of battle by an imaginary inundation, which spreads a panic. A picture of the rapacity of the Emperor's hangers-on and the mean results of the victory is given in order to show that here is no true scope for Faust's abilities.

* With these motives are associated two others—namely, the search of Mephistopheles for an appropriate form, which brings out the repulsive elements in classical mythology, where supreme ugliness, in contrast with ideal beauty, has its type in the Phorkyds or Gorgons, one of which he becomes; and also the striving of Homunculus after organic existence.

Act V. shows us the realisation of Faust's design. He has reclaimed from the sea a tract of land, the extent of which is shown by the episode of a wanderer returning after some years to visit the honest peasant couple who saved him from shipwreck, but whose cot is now far inland. Goethe gives this pair the names of Philemon and Baucis, "merely," as he says, "to elevate their characters," they having nothing to do with the couple celebrated in Ovid. All this seems rather weak. Faust, in his gorgeous palace, a giant of successful commerce and enterprise, finds his enjoyment marred by the one blot on his fair domain, the humble cottage and chapel which its owners will not part with. In his lust of power he cannot bear opposition; he wishes to give the aged pair a handsome estate in compensation, and orders them to be removed from their old home by force. But unjust commands produce unforeseen results. The rough minions to whom the order is entrusted are over-zealous, and Faust learns with sorrow and remorse that, meeting with resistance, they have set the place on fire, and that the old peasants and their guest have perished in the flames. Faust is now an aged man, and the spectres of Want, Blame, Care, and Distress visit him, the third remaining to haunt him to the end. He has learnt that rash interference with the established order of things, as typified by his magic, is vain. He now only fights manfully with Care, who visits him with blindness, and firmly resolves to forego his supernatural powers; so, though night is around him, a radiant light kindles within, and the blind man's spiritual eyes are opened. He can still labour for and through others, forgetting Care in beneficent activity. To complete his grand works of civil engineering, the draining of an unhealthy marsh is necessary, and he perceives with pain that he cannot hope to carry out all his plans in his life-time—for he is now a hundred years old. He says:—

At last the highest truth my mind discerneth;
Wisdom hath uttered her last word;
Freedom as well as life he only earneth
Who daily to the strife hath spurred.
So, peril-girt, a nation here will grow
Youth, manhood, age, as long as time shall flow.
Their busy crowds I fain would see
Upon a free soil stand with people free;
Then to the moment I might say:
Linger awhile, thou art so fair!
The traces of my blissful earthly day
No countless ages can impair—
In the foretaste of such consummate bliss
The highest moment is enjoyed—'tis this!

But these words fulfil the compact with Mephistopheles, and Faust sinks and dies. Mephistopheles, calling his infernal troop to assist him, endeavours to secure the soul which, by the letter of the wager, he has won, but a host of angels descends scattering roses in token of pardon, dispersing the fiends. Mephistopheles himself, after a keen struggle, is forced to retire baffled and discomfited, while the angels bear aloft Faust's immortal part. In fact, the wager, apparently lost, is in reality won, for though Faust has expressed himself desirous of no further ambition, his moment of highest enjoyment is found in labour for others; how can this then be a victory for the fiend?

Now follows a Dante-esque epilogue, the apotheosis of Faust. Goethe pictures a mighty mountain where saintly anchorites devote themselves to Divine worship, while spirits hover round them on the road to heaven. The mystical characters of Pater Ecstasius, Pater Profundus, Pater Seraphicus, &c., are all various types of the religious sentiment; Faust rises above them and, now called Doctor Marianus, soars to yet higher spheres, to the feet of the Mater Gloriosa. Three well-known pardoned female sinners plead for Gretechen, whose sin was unintentional, and she is bidden to rise and lead her former lover on the upward way, while a Chorus Mysticus appropriately ends the mighty poem with the well-known but none too intelligible words—

All that is transient
But symbolises;
Here the inadequate
To fulness rises;
Here the ineffable
All may decry;
The heavenly Woman*
Draws us on high.

So ends our attempt to give a merely prosaic account of the most imaginative and intangible of all poems. It cannot be denied that the symbolic element which, in this second part of "Faust," overrides everything else, is a great source of weakness by divesting all the characters of personal human interest. But the noble thoughts, the splendid poetry, more than atone for all. As in an opera, the worst of librettos can be forgiven when the music is of the first rank, so here the poetry is so rich and splendid that the unsatisfactory treatment of the story or plot seems almost pardonable.

One would have thought that no other poet would have been bold enough to touch the subject after Goethe; such is not the case however. Apart from Lord Byron's "Manfred" and "The Deformed Transformed," which were decidedly suggested by "Faust," there is a dramatic poem by R. Lenau in a number of disconnected scenes, some of considerable beauty. Then our modern English dramatists have been unable to keep their fingers off this fascinating legend, though it can hardly be said that they have justified their proceedings. For the sake of completeness it may be as well to mention some of the more prominent of these attempts. The French play-wright Michel Carré having, with truly French irreverence, turned the first part of Goethe's poem into a clear intelligible melodrama, by the simple process of cutting out all the poetry, this perversion was translated into English by Mr. Boucicault and produced by Charles Kean at the Princess's Theatre, in London, on April 19, 1854. The critics of the time spoke with some contempt of the play, though, as a spectacle, it drew crowded houses, in the same way as did the same manager's Shakespearian revivals. It is not stated what incidental music was used on this occasion. On March 24, 1856, was produced a short burlesque of this Princess's version, called "Marguerite." This had charming music by Tully. Passing over for the moment the English production of Gounod's opera, the next dramatic version of Goethe's play was that of Bayle Bernard at Drury Lane, on October 20, 1866, under Samuel Phelps. This adaptation will be pleasurably remembered by all who have seen it. The author wrote a sensible and modest apology for the alterations he had been forced to make in Goethe's poem, and stated that his play must not be looked upon in the light of a translation but as a free adaptation. Considered in this light the Drury Lane "Faust" was indeed an excellent piece of work, well mounted and acted. Phelps was Mephistopheles, his son Edmund Faust, and Mrs. Hermann Vezin Marguerite. The music was excellently selected and arranged by that best of theatrical conductors, Tully. To the subject of this music we shall return later on. So great was the success of this adaptation that three or four minor London theatres ran pirated versions at the same time. Passing by as of no importance the various burlesques and comic operas, such as Hervé's "Le Petit Faust" and Byron's "Very little Faust," and merely pausing to wonder wherein lies the hidden facetiousness of the adjective "little," which causes it to be the invariable prefix of a modern burlesque, we come to Mr. Herman Merivale's modern adaptation of the Faust and Marguerite story, called "The Cynic." This dressing up of an old story in modern guise resembles the practice of some modern musicians who, lacking ideas of their own, take Volkslieder or themes of old composers and dish them up with modern harmonies. The next was Mr. W. S. Gilbert's unfortunate play "Gretchen." Why so experienced a dramatist should have taken the trouble to re-write the now stereotyped story, deliberately enfeebling every one of its dramatic incidents, is beyond all comprehension. This piece, well-mounted and perhaps as finely acted all round as any version of "Faust" has ever been, was withdrawn after a few nights. Since that time the legend has been allowed to rest in peace until now, when a fresh perversion, by Mr. Wills, has been produced with such pomp at the Lyceum. We say perversion, for the new drama, while professing to be a translation, is sadly disfigured by alterations and interpolations; the title rôle is reduced to insignificance, and what little is left of Goethe is crushed under the exuberant grandeur of the scenery and stage display. Of the music to this version notice has been taken last month in a special article; a few more words will be necessary later on. There now remains only to mention a few dramatic works on the subject of "Faust," but in no way connected with Goethe's poem. Such are—

1. A dramatic entertainment called "The Necromancer; or, Harlequin Doctor Faustus," as performed at the Theatre Royal in Lincoln's Inn Fields, 1731.

This is only interesting as being one of the earliest plays on the subject. It only consists of a couple of scenes. In the first Faust sells himself, and a good and evil spirit alternately persuade him to listen to their counsel. In the second he entertains his friends with a Masque on the subject of Hero and Leander. This piece seems a mere fragment. It was mostly musical, but the music cannot be traced.

2. "Faustus," a romantic drama by George Soane, produced at Drury Lane, May 16, 1825; revived again in 1827.

3. "Faustus" (an improved version of the above), by H. P. Grattan. Sadlers Wells Theatre, 1840.

4. "The Devil and Dr. Faustus." Drama by Leman Rede. Strand Theatre, 1846. (This was a curious combination of serious and comic.) Mrs. Keeley played the part of Mephistopheles.

5. "Mephistophela." Grand Ballet d'Action, by Heinrich Heine. (Written in 1847 for Her Majesty's Theatre, but abandoned by Mr. Lumley as impracticable. Mephistopheles was here made to assume the form of a beautiful woman.)

No. 2 had music by Bishop, Horn, and Cooke, and will therefore be noticed again presently. From a literary point of view it is like the rest on this list, mere rubbish. We shall now turn from the Legend to its musical settings and attempt in our next paper to give a detailed list of the principal works, vocal and instrumental, to which the "Faust" story has given rise.

By JOSEPH BENNETT.

No. XVIII.—SCHUBERT (continued from page 11).

WE have seen that Franz Schubert left the Convict in October, 1813, and returned to his father's house in Gate of Heaven Street. As an extra mouth in the schoolmaster's home he could not have been greatly wanted, but, no doubt, he was heartily welcome when sire and sons made music amongst themselves. Franz completed the household quartet, of which Franz père, Ferdinand, and Ignace were members. A French writer, M. Barbedette, has drawn a pen picture of one of these family gatherings, and we offer no apology for presenting it, through the medium of a translation, to the reader's notice. Some of the details are probably imaginative, but they serve to heighten the general effect.

After noticing the agitated condition of Vienna in 1812-13, as the last stupendous incidents of Napoleon's career followed rapidly one upon another, M. Barbedette goes on:—

"One house in Vienna seemed strange to the general emotion. Let the reader be good enough to follow us into the Lichtenhalt district. We stand before a house of antique appearance; its architecture goes back several centuries: traces of painting may still be seen on the walls; a great red crab hangs above the door as though to indicate that the edifice dates from the middle age, of which it is the mute symbol. The heavy shutters are closed, but, in the rez-de-chassée, light comes through the interstices, and feeble sounds make themselves heard. . . .

"Nothing troubles the quiet of those who live in this peaceful dwelling. We enter a large white-washed room: a high fire-place, in which burns a small clear fire, occupies one end. To the left is a lithographic portrait of the Emperor Francis; to the right, one of Beethoven, then at the height of his genius. A fir book-case contains some works of the great masters. Forms are placed along the walls, on which hang maps and other things used in education.

"Four players are seated in the middle of the room, each before a desk and having a stringed instrument in his hand. They are absorbed in reading a new work by the illustrious singer of Bonn. The light of a suspended lamp allows us to observe the faces of these persons.

"The oldest plays the violoncello. He is still in the full strength of manhood, his hair is but slightly grizzled; his well accentuated features suggest an energetic nature. He is simply, almost rustically, dressed in the fashion of his class. An air of frankness and nobility tempers the somewhat hard expression of his eyes. The other performers treat him with respect.

"A young man of twenty-eight, with an expression of almost feminine softness, plays the first violin. Entirely abandoned to his emotion, he devours with his eyes the music before him.

"By his side, a somewhat older musician plays the second violin with no less energy.

"At the viola desk is a lad of fifteen, who seems in a state of inexpressible agitation. His hair is woolly; his face round; his nose flat; there is something about him of the negro. His figure is small and thick set, yet robust; extraordinarily brilliant eyes illuminate his face. He is the director of the quartet. If a false note is made he quickly recognises it; all his frame seems to shudder. If the defaulting player be one of the young men, he jumps up angrily, and flourishes his bow in the direction of the offender. But if the violoncello makes a slip, he moderates his wrath and with suppressed feeling, remarks 'Father, there is some mistake; let us begin again.' The father smiles, and the fault occurs no more. A fifth person regards the scene with pleasure—a woman, still young, who is seated near the fireplace. She seems to be preyed upon by a slow fever. Her eyes, full of sweetness, are surrounded by a dark circle. The wealth of her fair hair contrasts with the sickly paleness of her complexion. She nurses a little child, who is busy drawing figures on a slate. The woman listens to the music with a gentle sadness. Her eyes brighten every time she looks at the youngest of the executants.

"We must now name the actors in this scene.

"The middle-aged man is Franz Schubert, school-master in the Lichtenthal; the three young men are his sons: Ferdinand, teacher at an orphan school; Ignace, also a schoolmaster; Franz, who will become his father's assistant. The woman is a Silesian, Elisabeth Bitz, their mother. The child on her knees is Charles, the youngest of her sons."

We will not look too closely into the details of M. Barbedette's interesting picture, because, whatever its inaccuracy, it serves to bring before us the family to which Franz Schubert belonged, while as yet the mother lived.

It is said that Schubert's father did not regard with much favour his son's devotion to music. Probably that was so. Fathers are always making mistakes in such cases, because they listen to the voice of fancied wisdom in themselves, rather than to the promptings of nature in their sons. They array themselves against Providence and, of course, get the worst of the encounter; their sins, however, being visited upon the children, who are not to blame. It may be, on the other hand, that there was need for Franz to earn money for himself as soon as possible, and not increase the drain upon his father's slender resources. Assuming this, we can understand why the lad was sent for awhile to be trained at the school of St. Anna. He there fulfilled his term, and afterwards entered his father's school as teacher of the lowest class. Can we conceive a more unfit position for a lad of Schubert's aspirations and temperament? Pegasus harnessed to a plough alongside an ox is but an inadequate attempt at a parallelism. No wonder Schubert, as his sister Theresa once told Dr. Kreissle, was "strict and ill-tempered," and that he often "kept his hands in practice on the children's ears." When a man in rebellion against his circumstances relieves his feelings by boxing the bystanders, he must, of course, be condemned as not only wanting in philosophy, but in logic. But Schubert was too young for philosophy and too ardent for logic, and so the children suffered. Impulsive, romantic, made vaguely uneasy by the promptings of a genius he could as yet but half comprehend; what had he in common with the dreary routine of the school-room? Seven years later his mind went back to this period of life, and, under the similitude of a dream, he related experiences and feelings which show pretty clearly what sort of a lad he was. The Dream (written July 3, 1822) is, in part, not at all difficult to understand:—

"I was one brother among a number of brothers and sisters. Our father, our mother, were worthy people. I was deeply and fondly attached to the whole circle. My father took us out one day on a party of pleasure to a favourite spot. My brothers were in a state of great glee, but I was wretched. Well, my father came up to me, and bade me enjoy the delicacies before me, but I could not. Whereupon my father, in a rage, banished me from his presence. I turned away my steps, and with a heart full of boundless love for those who despised it, I wandered into the distant country. For long years I felt myself preyed on alternately by the greatest pain and most fervent love. Then the news of my mother's death was brought to me. I hastened away to see her, and my father, softened by affliction, did not stop my going then. Then I gazed on the dead body of my mother. My eyes filled with tears. Like the good old past days, to which my departed mother thought we should carry back our memories, as she did in her life time, she was lying dead before me. And we followed her poor body with mourning and woe, and the coffin sank into the earth. My father once more took me into his favourite garden; he asked me if I liked it. But the garden was distasteful to me, and I dared not trust myself to say anything. My father, kindling, a second time asked me if I liked the garden. I trembled and said 'No.' Then my father struck me and I fled. And a second time I turned my steps away, and, with a heart full of boundless love for those who scorned it, I once more went forth a wanderer in the world. For many, many long years I sang my Lieder. If I would find sing of love, it turned to pain; if I would sing of pain it would turn to love. Thus I was divided between love and sorrow. And once I was told of a pious maiden who had just died. A crowd gathered round her tomb, and in the midst of that crowd many youths and old men wandered as though in bliss. They spoke gently, as though fearing to wake the maiden. Heavenly thoughts seemed, like light sparks, to be for ever darting on the youths from the maiden's grave, and a gentle rustling noise was heard. I felt bashful and ashamed to walk there. 'It is by a miracle only,' said the people, 'that you are conducted to this circle.' But I advanced to the grave with slow steps, full of devotion and firm faith, my eyes fixed on the grave, and before I could have thought it possible I found myself in a circle, from which arose a wonderful strain of music, and I felt the bliss of eternity concentrated, as it were, into a moment. I saw, too, my father reconciled and loving towards me. He clasped me to his arms and wept, but I wept more sorely than he."

We leave the reader to interpret the latter part of the dream—the meaning of the first part is obvious—but the whole may be taken as a fanciful record of personal experience, one, moreover, which shows light upon the nature of the youth whom fortune had condemned to teach Viennese urchins their A B C.

It must not be supposed that the efforts of Schubert's father to divert him from composition had any effect. He thought of music by day and dreamed of it by night, while the more he did this, perhaps, the oftener the little boys' ears were made to tingle. Imagine this soaring youth dragged down to earth from the empyrean a thousand times by the thousand petty details of a teacher's life. Nevertheless, time was found for writing music, both at St. Anna's and in his father's house. In 1813, the year of his homecoming from the Convict, he composed four quartets, an octet for wind instruments, three orchestral minuets, three Kyries, a symphony, a third sonata for four hands, and some songs. In 1814 the catalogue of his youthful works was extended by an opera, "Des Teufel's Lustschloss," the First Mass (in F), and other works of less importance, but the year of greatest fecundity was 1815. His labours at this time were simply prodigious, and may be so regarded even if we take into account only the amount of writing necessary to put his thoughts on paper. He could hardly have "thought out" his music as other composers understand the term, and it is pardonable to regard him as the mere medium of communication between humanity and some superhuman source of song.

Among the works referable to 1815 are the Mass in G, the Mass in B flat, a Magnificat, a Salve Regina and Offertory, the second Dona nobis de Mass in F, the Quartet in G minor, two pianoforte Sonatas in C and F respectively, two Symphonies (B flat and D), six vocal Melodramas, including "Der vierjährige Posten," "Claudine von Villabell" and "Die beiden Freunde von Salamanka," and a large number of songs, of which the immortal "Erl-King" is one. Pretty well this for a boy of eighteen! Indeed, it is marvellous, astounding, incomprehensible, and we look upon it with as much wonder as upon the unfathomable operations of Nature. There is no need to add thereto by supposing, as is often done, that Schubert worked in the dark without encouragement or recognition. True, he was not known outside a small circle, but that circle constituted his world, and therein he found, at any rate, some measure of support and satisfaction. His sacred music, for example, was performed from time to time at the Lichenthal Church, the Mass in F being heard also at the Augustinian Church, Franz conducting and his brother Ferdinand playing the organ. It was after this success that Schubert's father, making, perhaps, a virtue of necessity, presented him with a new five-octave piano. Moreover, the young musician was blessed with excellent musical friends; among them a family named Grob, the head of which, a widow, carried on a silk factory hard by Gate of Heaven Street. The children of this widow were Thérèse, a girl in her "teens," an excellent singer, and Heinrich, who could play well upon the violoncello and piano. At the Grob house Schubert was a welcome guest, and he visited there often, drawn, it may be, by Thérèse's charms, as well as by the opportunities for making music. There is no definite reason for believing that Schubert fell in love with the widow's daughter, but some significance may attach to the fact that when the young lady married, in 1820, he ceased to visit at the house, and the ways of the friends fell apart. While the intimacy lasted it must have been very delightful. The composer's Masses were rehearsed with the Grobs, Thérèse singing the soprano solos, both there and in the church, and to the sister and brother he submitted the songs which his inexhaustible genius poured forth. We may add that Heinrich lived till 1855, and that Thérèse (Frau Bergmann) was "hale and hearty" in 1869, when Dr. Kreissle published his biography of the master. How, if Schubert himself had avoided death so long? To the support derived from association with the Grobs must be added that which the encomiums of Schubert's old master, Salieri, could not fail to give. We are told that, after hearing the Mass in F, the Italian musician embraced its composer, exclaiming, "You are my pupil, and will do me honour." Such words from such a quarter were praise indeed, since Salieri cannot be called the most generous of men. Moreover, Salieri's position was so eminent in Vienna that his every opinion carried weight. It does not appear that he exerted himself very strenuously to brighten the worldly prospects of his pupil, but Schubert must have been, at that sanguine period of his life, far more gratified by praise than by profit. The relations between the great man and the greater (who was then so small) remained of the best character, and it is pleasant to find Schubert assisting prominently at his former teacher's jubilee festival in 1816. Salieri then entered upon the fiftieth year of his service as Court Capellmeister. He had laboured long and well, the Emperor honoured him, and great preparations were made to celebrate the occasion. After a Church service, Salieri was conveyed in an Imperial carriage to the hotel of the Grand Steward, and there presented with a gold medal and chain. In the evening, a number of the old man's pupils gathered at his house, and performed compositions written by themselves in honour of the occasion. Schubert was among them; his offering being a Cantata, entitled "Contributions to the Jubilee Festival of Hof-Capellmeister Salieri, by his pupil, Franz Schubert." Dr. Kreissle gives a description of this work, but as he assures us that it is "more calculated to interest people by the circumstances to which it owes its origin than from its intrinsic value as a work of art," we need not trouble about it here, except to add that Schubert was no more happy than most other composers in writing "pieces of occasion."

It is pleasant thus to see the young school-teacher in circumstances which fostered his genius and encouraged its exercise; the more because a popular notion, due to loose generalisation, pictures him as labouring without a ray of cheering light. His position, it is true, was not the most favourable, but a young assistant in a parish school, who commands quartet parties at home, has his works performed in churches by competent choirs, enjoys access to good musical society, and is praised by the most dignified musician of the day, can hardly be regarded as a Chatterton in friendlessness and misery.

Schubert was fortunate in another respect: he found a poet in Johann Mayrhofer, a man ten years his senior. We know exactly, for the elder himself tells us, how the two came together. "My acquaintance with Schubert was brought about by a young friend giving him my poem, 'Am See,' to set to music. The friend brought him to that very room which, five years later, we were destined to share in common. It was in a dark, gloomy street. House and furniture were the worse for wear, the ceiling was beginning to bulge, the light obstructed by a huge building opposite, and part of the furniture was an old worn-out piano and a shabby bookstand. Such was the room. I shall never forget it, nor the hours we spent there. As the spring tempers the earth, clothing it with verdure and flowers, and refreshing it with breezes, so does she invigorate and endow mankind with the innate consciousness of productive power, for as Goethe says: 'How vast, sublime, and wholly magnificent is the perspective in the fields of life. From mountain on mountain soars the undying spirit in anticipation of an eternal life.' This depth of sentiment and mutual love for poetry and music drew our sympathies closer and closer. I wrote verses, he saw what I wrote, and to these joint efforts many of his melodies owed their beginning, end, and popularity in the world."

The last sentence in this extract defines the bond of union between men of widely varying character and temperament. Mayrhofer was retiring, mystical, —a prey to diseased views of life, which ultimately drove him to suicide. Schubert, on the other hand, though liable to fits of depression, like all sensitive natures, was fond of company, cheerful, and rejoiced in a healthy moral nature. But both were poets, and in the land of imagination there could be no diversity of thought or aim. Let us add here that Mayrhofer, referring to their subsequent close association as room-mates, wrote in his diary:—"Whilst we were together curious things happened. We were certainly both of us peculiar, and there were plenty of opportunities for droll incidents. We used to tease one another in all sorts of ways, and banded pleasantries and epigrams for our mutual benefit. His free, open-hearted, cheerful manner and my retired nature came into sharp contrast, and gave us an opportunity of nick-naming each other appropriately, as though we were playing certain parts assigned us. Alas! it was the only rôle I ever played."

The importance of Mayrhofer's friendship to Schubert at the early period with which we are now concerned cannot be estimated. If the fancy be permissible that for every man there is a woman, union with whom alone can make him complete (he often fails to find her), much more may it be said that the musician needs the poet for the full development of his genius. The two act and re-act one upon another, giving and receiving till each becomes the counterpart of his fellow. "Poetry is music in words and music is poetry in sound; both excellent sauce, but," adds old Andrew Fuller, as though with a prevision of Schubert and Mayrhofer, "they have lived and died poor that made them their meat."

The year 1816 was, like its immediate predecessor, a time of wonderful activity, because of which, mayhap, the children in Schubert's school-class suffered much. To it belong the "Tragic" Symphony and the second in B flat—the "Symphony without Trumpets and Drums." Apropos to these works, let us indicate Schubert as again enjoying an important advantage. The quartet at his father's house had, in course of time, grown into a small orchestra, amateurs being naturally attracted by the increasing repute of the young viola-player. This compelled a removal of the meetings from the schoolhouse in Gate of Heaven Street to the larger residence of a merchant named Frischling. There the Schuberts and their friends met from week to week, and there they laboured enthusiastically at such symphonies, overtures, &c., as lay within their means. When Fischling's room became too strait, they migrated to that of a Herr Hatwig, receiving further additions to their numbers, with an access of talent sufficient to warrant an attack upon the most advanced compositions of the day. For this society several of Schubert's orchestral works were written; among them the two symphonies last referred to. We need not take pains to show what great encouragement and help he must have derived from this opportunity of bringing his compositions to a ready performance. Even an amateur orchestra is far better than none at all in such a case.

Other productions attributable to the year 1816 are a Cantata, "Prometheus," for soli, chorus, and orchestra (Kreissle represents this as lost), the Mass in C, a Magnificat, part of a Requiem, a Stabat Mater, a portion of an opera, "Die Burgschaft," a vast number of instrumental works, and many songs, including "The Wanderer." Again we stand amazed at sight of such prodigious industry. There is no parallel to it in the history of human effort. With regard to "Prometheus," an entry appears in Schubert's diary, under date June 16, 1816:—"Today I composed the first time for money—namely, a Cantata ('Prometheus') for the name-day festival of Herr Professor Watteroth von Draxler. The honorarium, 100 florins, Viennese currency."

All this time Schubert remained as his father's assistant in the Lichtenthal School, but he longed to be emancipated from uncongenial labours. We are told that his duties were always conscientiously discharged—it does not appear what the children thought on this matter—but let a man's work be what it may, if he has no heart therein he cannot succeed. Probably Schubert was an indifferent teacher, labouring with perfunctoriness, and by no means keeping his thoughts during school hours within the four walls of the school-room. We know that he remained on the look-out for some musical post, and that, seeing one vacant in 1816, he applied for it. This was the head-mastership of a school of music connected with the Normal School at Laibach; so that, from a mere assistant teacher, Schubert aspired to be the trainer (in music) of his own order. His application for the place was duly made to Government, and supported by testimonials from Salieri and others. Dr. Kreissle's account of what followed is somewhat confused, but one thing is certain—Schubert did not succeed; the vote and influence of the all-powerful Hof-Capellmeister having been given to one Jacob Schauf. Salieri's reasons for passing over an old pupil, of whom he had formally spoken well, do not appear, but it is easy to imagine good grounds for his action. He may reasonably have considered Schubert as too young, or too inexperienced; or that such a creative genius would be likely to do better work for art than in controlling the routine of an academy. Anyhow, the youthful applicant suffered disappointment, and went back to his drudgery in Gate of Heaven Street.

Once again Providence sent him a friend in need, and in the nick of time, if there be any truth in the story that Schubert had a quarrel with his father and was dismissed. The story—which appeared in a Vienna paper forty years ago, and for which Kreissle does not vouch—is to the following effect: The Lichtenthal School, being of the sort now called "mixed," contained girls as well as boys, and one of the gentler sex, chancing to irritate the assistant-teacher, received from his practised hand a sound box on the ear. This summary proceeding may have been against the rules in regard of girl-pupils, or the punishment may have been unusually severe, but for some reason or other Schubert's father indignantly reprimanded his subordinate, who soon received an intimation which caused him to resign. In all this we see no improbability, considering Schubert's disgust with his duties and his quick, impulsive temperament; but there is more pleasure in believing that the young teacher abandoned his occupation under circumstances of greater credit, and solely through the action of the friend to whom reference has just been made.

THE NATIONAL SOCIETY OF PROFESSIONAL MUSICIANS.

THE lack of some system of regular and friendly communion has, by the thousands of musicians scattered throughout the country, long been felt as a very great drawback from their enjoyment of artistic life, and as a serious hindrance to their efforts to advance the general culture of music. In every other profession, and in almost every other calling, a feeling of fellowship is kept alive by some kind of organisation, facilitating a frequent interchange of opinion among those who devote their lives to a like pursuit. But the disciples of that Art which, of all influences, should (and often does) draw men closer together, have remained, until quite recently, without any means of co-operation, and without any show of interest of one in another's welfare or progress. Attempts have, from time to time, been made to bring about a better state of things; but, whether from an indistinct perception of the necessary conditions of union, or from the absorption of the leaders of the musical world in their own special business, or from despair of achieving any real good, or whatever cause, musicians long remained in a completely isolated condition.

Naturally, the evils of such a state were less keenly felt in London and in the larger towns—where the paths of the busiest and most absorbed men must, occasionally, cross—than in the less thickly populated districts, where professional musicians were dotted about as sparsely as the far-west pioneers of American progress, or as the twenty-mile apart squatters of the Australian bush. In such solitude a teacher—originally full of artistic enthusiasm—must, almost inevitably, sink into a machine of regular labour, daily plodding through its accustomed routine, with little interest, and, consequently, with ever lessening effect. Unquestionably, much harm has resulted from the apathetic spirit thus engendered, and from the growing feeling of powerlessness to achieve any real good beyond securing an honourable livelihood. The charge, often thoughtlessly brought against musicians, of eccentricity rests mainly upon the peculiarly solitary, uneventful, monotonous kind of life many of them pass, and the rarity of their being able to enjoy any companionship with men of congenial tastes, education, and habits. The intercourse of professional men and amateurs, or of master and pupil, is not on fair terms. There is an inequality of authority and of artistic judgment that naturally begets, in the more advanced, a dogmatism like that of the pulpit, an autocratic tone which grows habitual, and which, in every way, acts injuriously; finally unfitting a man for the freedom of truly social conversation.

But the interchange of ideas among men of like calibre has a powerful effect in rubbing off angularities and oddities, and in smoothing the roughnesses and sweetening the acerbities that the solitary and devoted pursuit of a pet study tends to generate. What has long been wanted is a kind of Parliament of earnest educated artists and experienced teachers, in which all questions affecting music and musicians could be freely discussed, with an equality of strength and weight, broken only (as all discussions must be) by that deference to well-formed opinions which the admitted merit and sound advice of a respected authority necessarily and properly command.

Some three years ago the disadvantages of the present state of things impressed men who seem to have been capable of forming a true estimate of the work to be done, and a right judgment with regard to the best way to set about it; men able to attract, and gather round them, those who could labour unselfishly and undauntedly for the general good. In the Northern and Midland counties some preliminary gatherings of a few influential musicians led to the formation of that Society of Professional Musicians which—having attracted, from all sides, the sympathy of teachers quick to perceive the honesty and wisdom of the movement; and having covered the provinces with a net-work of organisation—has, during the early part of the last month, concluded its first annual Conference in London with an open meeting, to which all metropolitan musicians were invited, and at which many of them attested their thorough sympathy with the undertaking, and their desire to join the ranks of the Association, and to render it truly national, as well in the catholicity of its working as in the wideness and liberality of its aims. The prudence and timeliness of the agitation has been proved by the simple fact that wherever a deputation from the Society has journeyed, the goodwill of the musicians of the district has been excited. In the South and West of England during the spring, and in the Eastern counties at the close of the past year, very many recruits were enlisted; so that at the recent meetings in London the musicians of the whole of the kingdom were represented with a completeness never previously attained at any gathering of a like kind.

We must refer our readers to the general secretary (Mr. E. Chadfield, of Derby) for the rules, and for all details of the working of the Society; simply pointing out that the advantages of a power of local action as free as is consistent with unity of general purpose appears to be secured; that the votes of the members in their respective districts are collected and acted upon by a central council, which consists of two delegates from each province; that, already a system of examination has been established (and may be extended to any locality where it is asked for) free from all the disadvantages arising from the exaltation in a country town of one local professor over his colleagues; that a book (now in its second edition) has been published, designed primarily for examination purposes, but equally valuable as a text-book for teachers and as an evidence of the lines upon which, by the common consent of musicians of all schools and living in all parts of the country, an education in music should be traced.

Naturally, at the recent Conference, amid much proof of sound judgment and far-sightedness, some nonsense was uttered by the less-experienced members. Three meetings were held for free exposure and discussion of all the workings and plans of the Association. A healthy diversity of opinion was expressed; but, so far as appeared, the Society has not entered, and does not propose to enter, upon any ill-advised course. Some crude views concerning the registration of musicians, the mutual relation of composer and publisher, the duty of the government, and other points, were expressed. But it was rendered evident, by the applause with which certain speakers were received, that the judgment of the great majority of the members was sound and firm. No extravagant complaints, or wild suggestions, found favour.

So long as the movement may be carried on in the spirit shown to be now actuating its guides, we shall cordially wish it success. Mr. Prout's proposition, which was at the very large gathering of London musicians carried with only one dissentient voice, justly maintained that "the National Society of Professional Musicians is entitled to hearty support."

THE performance of Gounod's last great work, "Mors et Vita," by command and in the presence of Her Majesty, at the Royal Albert Hall, on the 26th inst., cannot but be regarded as one of the highest compliments ever paid to an artist and his art by Royalty in England. We believe we are right in saying that this will be the first time since the death of the Prince Consort that the Queen has attended an entertainment entirely unconnected with any state occasion or ceremonial; and that her re-appearance should be for the sole purpose of hearing a musical composition expressly written for this country, is a sufficient evidence that her enforced retirement from public life has in no respect lessened her love for that art in the progress of which she has so frequently proved that she takes the keenest interest.

THE advantages likely to arise from Co-operation and Competition in Music which were foreshadowed a few months back in these columns by Mr. Joseph Bennett, on the occasion of the Choral Contests in the Albert Hall, have already received remarkable fulfilment in the provinces, on the testimony of so competent a witness as Mr. J. Spencer Curwen. In a letter of his to the Standard, which appeared just too late for us to notice in our January issue, he says, "I have just returned from a visit to Nottingham and the Potteries, two districts which greatly distinguished themselves at South Kensington. Everywhere I heard the strongest testimony to the good done. At Nottingham three or four new societies have been floated on the tide of public interest in choral music. In the Potteries 600 or 700 persons have this winter joined preparatory singing classes, in order to fit themselves for membership in one or other of the prize choirs. I may mention that the choralists of the Potteries are almost all men and women employed in the pottery trades of the district. The encouragement of choral singing as a recreation for the working classes seems to me a matter of the highest national importance." In this connection we may note, on the authority of the Standard of the 7th ult., that, for the furtherance of the new scheme of recreative evening classes adopted by the London School Board on the lines of those already successfully established in Nottingham, a considerable number of persons have already offered themselves as voluntary teachers in such subjects as singing, musical drill, &c., in response to the appeal issued by a voluntary Association for supplying the means and the teachers for classes in subjects not recognised by the Code, and in whose aims Princess Louise, the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Bishop of London, and other influential persons have interested themselves. It is confidently expected that in the term which began on the 11th ult. valuable aid will be lent to the School Board by this Association, encouraged as it is by the excellent results achieved elsewhere by a similar organisation.

THE American musical critics have, as we have frequently mentioned, a habit of speaking out; and although we do not always agree with their remarkably straightforward denunciation of men and things obnoxious to them, we very often light upon a few wholesome truths which acquire additional force from the unmistakably plain words which are used to express them. We have spoken much, and very decisively, upon the opposition too often manifested by the clergy to the introduction of a higher class of music into the service of the church, and from time to time have quoted the opinions of some of the most liberal members of the clerical profession in favour of this much needed reform. In America it is evident that the matter is as keenly contested as in this country, for in an article headed "Church Choirs," in the Oriole Tidings, a paper published in Baltimore, the writer says, "Like the much abused mother-in-laws, the conventional 'quartet choir' has long been the theme of much foolish and unmeaning pleasantry; but did ministers, as a general rule, know as much of music as the average organist and quartet choir do of religion, these things could not, nor would not occur. Great stress has also been laid upon the fact that they are 'hired creatures,' and being paid for their services, should not be tolerated. Now wherein they differ from the same reverend gentlemen who make these complaints, we fail to comprehend. Nature has given to each certain talents that they make use of as 'bread winners' for themselves and their families; and in a pecuniary view both ends of the church being dependent upon their salaries, are entitled to a like amount of consideration." Here indeed, in a small compass, the fact is clearly stated. America no doubt believes that all who aid in the religious service are on an equality; and should this creed be admitted in England, when the clergy begin to question the quality of the music rendered by educated singers—many of whom are drawn from the congregation—the congregation may begin to question the quality of the sermons preached by the clergy.

THE many songs expressive of the opinion of the people upon the actions of those by whom they are governed, sufficiently prove that the political world is much influenced by music; but it is only recently that we have been made aware of the fact that the musical world is materially influenced by politics. News from Northwich at once places this beyond doubt, for we are told that "Mr. Egerton Warburton, who represented Mid-Cheshire in the last Parliament, has intimated to the Philharmonic Society that he will not continue his subscription. Northwich, he says, has seen fit to return a Radical to Parliament, and there is no doubt that the town is Radical. Probably, therefore, the Philharmonic Society is a Radical affair, and he does not wish to be identified with it. Another Conservative, Mr. Cecil Parr, has no doubt the morals of Northwich want raising, but as he does not think a performance of 'The Messiah' will attain that object, he declines to subscribe." There is a delightful originality in the notion that a Society formed for the purpose of performing the works of the great musical composers of the world will most probably prove to be "a Radical affair," because the town has thought proper to return a member holding such opinions to parliament; for, even supposing that the Society is largely composed of persons who reflect the views of their representative, it is difficult indeed to imagine how this can influence the nature of the concert programmes, or colour the performance of the instrumental or vocal artists engaged. Surely Handel's "Sacred Oratorio," too, is of too divine a nature to need the patronage of any political party; and if the presentation of the work should not have the effect of "raising the morals" of Northwich, it will at least most eloquently preach that doctrine of peace and goodwill which may well be taken to heart by the partisans of all worldly creeds.

WE have often called attention to the class of music provided for those who visit a watering place during the summer months; and as the consideration of this subject should not be postponed until the arrival of the season for these open-air concerts, we quote what is said by the London critic of the New York Journal, Music and Drama: "When I read the account of your musical entertainments at sea-side resorts," he writes, "I begin to think that we are far behind America in this matter; and I am sure we are behind Continental countries. On your Coney Island there is much finer music than we hear at Margate or Ramsgate, where the town band, or the German band, or the solo singer with the shrill voice, or the nigger minstrel have it all their own way. I was astonished at the musical fêtes that are given in America at summer resorts. We have nothing of the kind; not even a decent chorus." We can conscientiously bear practical testimony to this statement, and even assert that not only have we not a "decent chorus" at our seaside towns, but that we have no chorus at all. Usually a cheap band is engaged, the coarseness of which drives every person afflicted with a musical organisation from the spot, and the répertoire of which seems selected chiefly for the gratification of the nursery maids and children, who form the principal portion of the audience. This may perhaps be, from a narrow point of view, a politic proceeding; but in virtually excluding the employers of the nursery maids, and the parents of the children, those who should be the financial supporters of the undertaking are really ignored. It is evident that they understand this sort of thing better in America; and if fêtes like those mentioned by our contemporary as having taken place at Coney Island could be organised in England, we might be attracted, instead of repelled, by our summer sea-side music.

THE proprietors of the Bombay Gazette have forwarded us a copy of a song, called "Zahkné"—"Wounded by Love"—which, we are told, has become the National Anthem of Afghanistan. When his Highness the Amir Abdul Rahman was at Peshawur, in April, on his return from Rawal Pindi to Kabul, this air was played and sung for his delectation by a military band hidden among the trees while the Amir was at breakfast in the garden of Colonel Waterfield. The effect, it is said, was wonderfully striking, and the Amir expressed his great pleasure at the performance. The air, which is published with the Pushtu words, has been arranged for the accompaniment of a pianoforte by a musician in Bombay; and although we cannot notice it in our reviewing columns, we are glad here to draw attention to its merits as an excellent specimen of a characteristic national melody. Of course, we cannot tell what the effect of the air was as rendered in the garden during the Amir's breakfast—for it was scored for the band of a regiment by the native bandmaster, Jehan Khau, and some Pathans of the band, we are informed, sang the parts with much expression and spirit—yet the sometimes plaintive, and sometimes martial, character of the tune, which is said to be Afridi in its origin, seems to reflect the character of the people with such remarkable fidelity that we are by no means surprised that it should be regarded by the Afghans as a National Anthem.

A STRIKING instance of the union of a strong taste for music with a passion for the fine arts is to be found in the subject of one of the liveliest and brightest of recent biographies—Gustave Doré. Jealous of contemporary painters and sculptors, he harboured no such feelings towards musicians, and reckoned among his intimate friends and frequent guests, Rossini, Gounod, Liszt, Pauline Viardot, Alboni, Faure, Nilsson, and Patti. Doré himself was a much more than average amateur. He played the violin with considerable taste and spirit; Rossini styled him un tenorino charmant, s'il vous plaît; and by his clever jöddelling and excellent imitations of leading artists he often delighted and entertained his musical friends. Music would sometimes go hand in hand with work in his case, and he has been known to quit his drawings in order to play a maddening polka for his friends to dance to, and then, laying down his violin, to return to his task in the corner of the studio. Finally, we read that, not content with musical boxes, he took a delight in mystifying his guests with musical decanters.

MUSICAL students who desire to know more than at present regarding the state of the art in Germany before Bach and Handel arose, will observe with much pleasure that Messrs. Breitkopf and Härtel have arranged with Dr. Chrysander and Herr Spitta to publish a complete edition of Heinrich Schütz's works as far as they have come down to us. Our readers do not need to be told that the famous Leipzig firm has thus taken an important step in connection with the tri-centenary of the composer's birth. Schütz was a master in the full sense of the term, but suffered eclipse amid the splendour of his immediate successors. It is time now to do him justice and to demonstrate not only the nature and extent of his personal gifts, but in what measure he influenced Bach and Handel and laid a foundation upon which they laboured. Messrs. Breitkopf and Härtel propose to accomplish this by issuing the old master's works in ten volumes at the rate of two volumes a year, thus completing the edition in 1890. The first is already out, and contains the "Resurrection," the Four Passions, the "Christmas Stories," and the "Seven Last Words." We strongly advise amateurs to procure this volume, and judge for themselves as to the interest and value of treasures so long withheld from general use. The names of the editors guarantee completeness and accuracy in a special degree, and we shall be surprised if their labours do not meet with wide appreciation in this country.

ROYAL ALBERT HALL CHORAL SOCIETY.

THE Concerts of this Society since our last notice have been limited to the repetition of familiar works, do not demand lengthy criticism. On New Year's Day "The Messiah" was performed before a densely packed audience, thus affording the best possible refutation of the absurd statement that Handel's masterpiece is losing its popularity. True, our public is less exclusive than it once was; other works of various schools which formerly would have been ignored, save by a few connoisseurs, now attract a large measure of popular attention. But there is not a tittle of evidence to support the assertion that "The Messiah" is losing its hold on the minds and affections of the people. The performance on the 1st ult. was fully up to the Albert Hall Society's usual standard, and no higher praise need be given. Nor is there need to dwell on the manner in which Miss Anna Williams, Madame Patey, and Mr. Lloyd sang their respective airs. But special commendation should be given to Mr. Watkin Mills, who, by his effective rendering of the bass solos, heightened his already growing reputation. And it may be added that the obligato in "The Trumpet shall sound" was played upon the long trumpet re-manufactured for the Bach commemoration performance last March. On this instrument the high notes can be obtained with greater ease, but the tone will not compare with our modern slide trumpet.

The "Faust" of Berlioz has now taken a settled place in the Society's repertory, and a performance is looked for every season. That of the 20th ult. demands little more than formal record, as the soloists were precisely the same as those of last year. That admirable artist, Madame Valleria, sang the music of Marguerite with rare beauty of expression. Mr. Lloyd was perfect as Faust, and Mr. Barrington Foote did his best, though with unequal physical means, as Mephistopheles. It is inevitable that some of Berlioz's delicate orchestral tracery should be lost in the Albert Hall, but, in compensation, Mr. Barnby's well trained choristers render the choruses with a power and breadth unattainable elsewhere. The exclamation "Ha!" at the end of the mocking serenade, comes like a smart electric shock, and the splendid tone in the chorus of soldiers and students is as effective as the extreme delicacy in "Dream, happy Faust." The large audience and the enthusiastic applause showed how much this remarkable work is now appreciated by amateurs.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.

A SEASON of the Sacred Harmonic Society that did not include "Elijah" would be as impossible as a performance of "Hamlet" without the Prince of Denmark. The public demands Mendelssohn's oratorio and always musters in sufficient numbers to fill any room in which it is given. The rendering on the 16th ult. was not, perhaps, quite so good as on some former occasions, but the defects only consisted of a few slips in the orchestra. Miss Anna Williams was of course safe with the soprano music. Madame Patey repeated her familiar successes, the tenor solos were undertaken by Mr. Winch, and Mr. Santley, being in splendid voice, rendered the part of the Prophet in a manner wholly unsurpassable. Miss Eleanor Rees exhibited a pleasant mezzo-soprano voice, and a good artistic method in a portion of the contralto music. Mr. Cummings, who conducted generally with tact and judgment, should not have accepted the encore for "Lift thine eyes." Under Sir Michael Costa an encore of this particular number was impossible, because the Neapolitan Conductor used to join the last bar to the first of the succeeding chorus. Such a course was contrary to the composer's directions, and therefore unjustifiable, but it is a pity to exchange one evil for another.

MONDAY AND SATURDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

THE dearth of music in London during the fortnight after Christmas was complete, and the resumption of Mr. Chappell's Concerts on the 11th ult. was therefore doubly welcome. True to the policy he has observed from the commencement of the season, the programme contained a novelty, albeit on this occasion it was not a work of great pretentiousness. When Spohr was in London at the invitation of the Philharmonic Society, in 1820, he wrote, among other pieces for his favourite instrument, the violin, an Adagio in G, and this was brought forward by Madame Néruda, who has no equal in the interpretation of Spohr's music. The Adagio is a charming movement, truly characteristic of its composer, and it pleased greatly. Madame Néruda followed it by Paganini's Moto Perpetuo, of which she gives a masterly rendering. That which created the greatest interest in the Concert, however, was the performance of Schumann's Etudes Symphoniques, by Miss Fanny Davies. The young artist's rendering of this extremely arduous work was marked by intelligence and good taste, reminding us at times of Madame Schumann. More power might have been thrown into some of the variations, but in all other respects the performance was wholly satisfactory. The great applause which followed every movement of Schubert's Trio in E flat (Op. 100) testified to the delight of the audience with this superb but strangely neglected work, which belongs to Schubert's ripest period, and, like the Quintet in C and the Quartet in G, has no superior of its class. Mr. Lloyd sang two of Dvorák's exquisite Lieder, and others by Schubert and Mendelssohn. Beethoven's ever-popular Septet drew an enormous throng on the following Saturday, many persons being glad to obtain even standing room. The work had the benefit of an exceptionally fine performance, the executants being Madame Néruda and Messrs. Straus, Lazarus, Paersch, Wotton, Hausmann, and Bottesini. The Concert was rendered still more interesting by the performance for the first time of Schumann's "Märchen erzählungen" (Op. 132), for clarinet, viola, and pianoforte. This work dates from 1853, when Schumann's mind was rapidly giving way, and it must have been penned during one of those brief periods when the torch of reason burst again through the gathering clouds, for it is as clear and genial as anything that ever proceeded from this composer. The "Legendary Tales" are in four movements, all marked by conciseness and freedom from elaboration of detail. They are all charming, but the gem is No. 3, a very melodious sketch in the style of a song without words. The clarinet part was played on the violin, a course sanctioned by the composer, though surely unnecessary on this occasion, Mr. Lazarus being one of the artists engaged for the Septet. Mr. Charles Hallé introduced, for the first time, Chopin's early Nocturne in B flat minor (Op. 9, No. 1) and Brahms's clever and characteristic, though somewhat dry, Scherzo in E flat minor (Op. 4).

It is laudable on the part of M. de Pachmann to seek for artistic success in the music of Beethoven, but he would show wisdom if, in interpreting the works of this great master, he would throw aside those mannerisms and affectations which are harmless enough in Chopin and Henselt. The first and last movements of the Sonata in D minor (Op. 31, No. 2), at the Concert of the 18th, were spoilt by the abuse of the rubato, and the general trickiness of the player's method. M. de Pachmann was far more at home in Raff's "La Fileuse," which he gave as an encore. The novelty at this Concert was Schumann's Adagio and Allegro in E flat (Op. 70), for horn and pianoforte, composed in 1849, while Schumann was in voluntary exile. It is a charming piece, the Adagio being especially pleasing. The horn part was played on the violoncello by Herr Hausmann, a course justified by the title page of the work. The same composer's clear and concise Quartet in F (Op. 41, No. 2) and Haydn's merry Quartet in C (Op. 33, No. 3) were included in the programme. Miss Louise Phillips, whose vocal selections are generally well chosen, sang airs by Goring Thomas and Maude White.

There was no actual novelty in the programme of Saturday, the 23rd ult., but Beethoven's Quintet in E flat (Op. 4) had only been given thrice before, and was therefore probably unfamiliar to the majority of those present. The Quintet is necessarily overshadowed by the superior majesty and beauty of its companion in C (Op. 29), but it has merits of its own, notably in the minuet, with its two trios, and the sparkling Finale, which was evidently written under the influence of Haydn. Beethoven was also represented by the Sonata in A (Op. 101), which Mr. Max Pauer essayed. The last sonatas of the Bonn master tax the abilities of the most experienced pianists, and Mr. Pauer scarcely rose to the level of his argument, though he played carefully and conscientiously. Brahms's favourite Pianoforte Quartet in G minor (Op. 25), and Chopin's Polonaise in C, for piano and violoncello (Op. 3), were included in the programme; and Mr. Lloyd sang "In native worth," and repeated Dvorák's songs, by desire.

There may be good reasons for reserving the more popular and attractive works of the repertory for the Saturday performances, but one inevitable result of this policy is to thin the attendance on Mondays. Thus, on the 25th ult., the programme, although interesting enough to musicians, was not of a nature to attract the public, and the small audience may be set down to this circumstance as much as to the inclement weather. Novelty played a considerable part in the scheme, the most important first performance being that of Brahms's Sonata in E minor (Op. 38), for pianoforte and violoncello. This work may, on the whole, rank among the best of Brahms's chamber compositions, the first movement being especially fine in conception and treatment, while the piquant allegretto quasi menuetto, and the ingeniously written Finale are worthy to succeed it. The Sonata was beautifully played by Miss Fanny Davies and Herr Hausmann, and we may take this opportunity of congratulating Mr. Chappell on having secured the last named admirable artist as a substitute for Signor Piatti. Miss Davies played three of Scarlatti's pieces with the utmost fluency and clearness, and for an encore a tasteful Romance by Miss Maude White. Spohr's charming Quartet in A minor (Op. 74, No. 1) commenced the Concert, and Haydn's in D minor (Op. 42) closed it. A very favourable impression was made by the vocalist, Mr. Henry Piercy. In Handel's air, "Would you gain the tender creature," Mr. Piercy displayed a tenor voice of excellent quality, and a refined and artistic method. Capable tenors are so scarce that any addition to their ranks is certain to be warmly welcomed.

HERR FRANK'S CHAMBER CONCERTS.

FEW, if any, musical caterers exhibit greater enterprise and perseverance than Herr Hermann Franke, and his latest undertaking is well conceived, and seems likely to meet with acceptance from the public. The new series of Concerts, at which a Vocal Quartet is to take a leading part, was commenced at the Princes' Hall, on the 26th ult. The idea is to perform concerted works for voices, and on this occasion the first of Brahms's "Liebesslieder Walzer" and Schumann's "Spanisches Liederspiel" were presented. These charming compositions are now so fully known and appreciated that it is unnecessary to describe them further. No better selections could have been made for the début of the Vocal Quartet, and the hearty applause testified to the success of the artists' efforts. In a case of this kind individual excellence is of less moment than unity of ensemble, and this can only be attained by each of the members studying the method and peculiarities of the others. At present the contralto, Miss Lena Little, and the tenor, Mr. Winch, are superior to the soprano and bass. Miss Bessie Hamlin has a bright and pure soprano voice, but her production is too German to be wholly pleasant. A little carefully directed study would rectify this, and Miss Hamlin might become a vocalist of the highest rank. Variety was given to last Tuesday's programme by the inclusion of Schubert's splendid Quintet in C (Op. 163) and Chopin's Ballade in G minor, the last played by Miss Amy Hare. The performance of the Quintet by Messrs. Ludwig, Collins, Stelling, Whitehouse, and Hann was of great excellence, and deserved even more applause than it received. The vocal works are to be repeated at the next Concert, on the 23rd inst., when they will be sung in English.

HERR BONAWITZ'S PIANOFORTE RECITALS.

THE principal feature of interest attaching to these serial exhibitions of individual skill on the part of a very able, though, as far as poetic feeling is concerned, somewhat commonplace pianoforte player, consists in their historical character; the programme of each of the three Recitals which have so far taken place being illustrative of the development of pianoforte music during the past three centuries. Similar undertakings have been on the increase of late, and should be unreservedly welcomed in the best interests of the study of musical art generally. At the Recital specially under notice (the last one of a series of three), which took place at Princes' Hall, on the 14th ult., representative specimens were given of the early writers, Frescobaldi and Rameau, which led up to the German masters Bach, Handel, and Mozart; the historical survey proper concluding with those comparatively modern composers, by whom the resources of the instrument have been revealed to an extent previously undreamt of—viz., Beethoven, Field, Weber, Schumann, Thalberg, Chopin, and others. To these were added, by way of appendix, several numbers by contemporary composers, the selection concluding with Liszt's "Le Rossignol" and "Galop Chromatique." If we add that the whole of this stupendous programme was gone through, with scarcely any intermission, entirely from memory, we think we have recorded a most remarkable feat of skill and intellect on the part of the concert-giver, and of endurance on that of the audience, who preserved an attitude of marked attention until the last note had been played, and the pianist had made his final bow in acknowledgment of their well merited applause. Herr Bonawitz, it should be added, played the earlier pieces on a harspichord made by Shudi, which contributed materially to the historical complexion of his interpretation. These Recitals are to be renewed during the present month.

MUSIC IN BIRMINGHAM.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

THE musical event of the month has been the Clef Club Anniversary Festival, which took place on the 22nd ult., and comprised a dinner, to which some 240 guests sat down, and a Concert. The festivity was attended by a large number of musical notabilities, including Sir Arthur Sullivan, the president of the Club; Mr. F. H. Cowen, Mr. J. F. Barnett, Mr. A. C. Mackenzie, Mr. Praeger, Mr. A. Littleton, Mr. Walter Bache, Mr. Franklin Taylor, Mr. Frederic King, Mr. J. T. Carrodus, Mr. D'Oyley Carte, Mr. Eaton Fanning, &c. The programme, which comprised several novelties composed for the occasion, was devoted chiefly to English composers, including Sir Arthur Sullivan, Dr. Bridge, Mr. F. H. Cowen, Mr. J. F. Barnett, and Mr. A. Goring Thomas. Mr. Cowen took part in the performance of his own melodious Pianoforte Trio in A minor, written when the composer was only sixteen. Mr. F. King sang, with fine effect, Sir Arthur Sullivan's ballad "Edward Gray," and Mr. Iver McKay produced an excellent impression in the same composer's "Come, Margarita, come," from his Leeds Cantata, "The Martyr of Antioch," which was accompanied by the composer himself. Mr. Carrodus gave a masterly rendering of Molique's "Fandango." Two movements—the Andante in C minor and the Scherzo in G major—from Mr. Mackenzie's Pianoforte Quartet in E flat major, were admirably played by Mr. Albert Mitchell, Mr. F. Ward, Mr. E. W. Priestley, and Mr. A. J. Priestley. Mr. Brewerton sang, to the composer's accompaniment, a new song, entitled "Missing," specially written for this Concert by Mr. J. F. Barnett. Miss Gertrude Griswold exhibited a fine voice and style in an "Egyptian Lullaby," an original and piquant melody from Mr. Silas G. Pratt's Opera "Zenobia," and a new humorous glee by Dr. Bridge, of Westminster Abbey, entitled "The Goose," was sung with mirth-provoking effect by eight members of the club. Altogether the Concert was one of exceptional interest and merit.

Mr. Charles Lunn's annual Vocal Concert, which took place in the Town Hall on the 9th ult., brought together an overflowing audience, but the interest of the event was rather personal than musical, the performers being all past or present pupils of the bénéficiaire, a well-known local teacher of singing and voice production. The selection comprised, among other and less familiar pieces, Macfarren's trios "The Troubadour" and "The three dreams," Mercadante's tertetto "Che sento," Costa's quartets "Ecco quel fiero istante" and "Honour and glory," ("Naaman"), Beethoven's trio "Tremate empi tremate," Donizetti's "O luce di quest' anima" ("Linda"), Handel's "Angels, ever bright and fair" ("Theodora"), and "Revenge, Timotheus cries" ("Alexander's Feast") Barnby's "When the tide comes in," Roedel's "Angus MacDonald," and Clay's "I'll sing thee songs of Araby." Several of the singers revealed voices of excellent quality and power, as well as good method and style, and their performances were warmly applauded.

At Messrs. Harrison's third Subscription Concert, which took place on the 25th ult., the principal performers were Miss Robertson, Madame Trebelli, Mr. Edward Lloyd, and Mr. Santley (vocalists); M. Vladimir de Pachmann (pianoforte) and M. Hollmann (violoncello), in the instrumental department. Signor Bisaccia conducted.

MUSIC IN LIVERPOOL.

THE shining light of English opera, rendered under circumstances which must satisfy the cravings of any orthodox critic, has almost overshadowed, for the time being, all other musical events, however notable. Mr. Carl Rosa's axiom of placing before the public the most perfect tout ensemble which can be secured without pandering to the vicious "star" system, has again been exemplified during his present season at the Royal Court Theatre, and crowded audiences have testified, in an almost unprecedented manner, to the successful efforts of the popular impresario. Perhaps the claim to precedence is due to "Nadeshda," which, at its performance on the 11th ult., recalled the scenes of enthusiasm which greeted the first production in England of Massenet's "Manon," in the same theatre, twelve months previously. At the end of the third act the audience refused to be satisfied until the composer, Mr. Goring Thomas, had bowed his acknowledgments.

The first production in this country of the French opera "Fadette," which has already achieved its reputation in France and Germany under the original title of "Les Dragons de Villars," took place on the 18th ult., and was received with pronounced marks of approval. "Fadette" does not aim to be classed in the category of grand opera, but rather by an interesting plot, followed intently by pleasing music of a character exactly suited to the varying phases of the story, endeavours to engross the attention of the auditory without making any distinct impression, and in this it is thoroughly successful. It was Gounod's own expressed opinion that if he were not Gounod he would like to be Maillart, and certainly the beauty of the scoring, and the delicacy with which many of his themes are worked out, justify such a high endorsement. "Fadette" is essentially a Continental work, and whilst written to please, it contains many instances—notably in the impressive hermitage scene in the second act—where the solidity of style and grasp of orchestral resources evidence the superior capabilities of the composer. The rôle of Fadette was sustained by Madame Marie Roze with conspicuous success, and Madame Julia Gaylord as Georgette, and Mr. Barton McGuckin as Sylvain, acted and sang throughout with unusual spirit. Amongst the other works performed have been "Manon," "Carmen," "Mignon," and Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," and we are promised, at an early date, Marchetti's "Ruy Blas," an opera of the highest classical school, which comes with special credentials from Italy.

The Liverpool Philharmonic Society inaugurated the second half of its 1885-6 programme on the 5th ult., when Dvorák's Symphony in D (Op. 60) was the principal item. The Orchestral works also comprised the overtures to Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" and Schubert's "Alfonso ed Estrella," and an excerpt from Beethoven's Septet, which, contrary to recognised precedent and principle, was performed by the full band, under the conductorship of Mr. Charles Hallé. Mr. and Mrs. Henschel, old Liverpool favourites, appeared as the vocalists of the evening, and their selections were appropriate and well rendered. The only choral item of consequence was a group of choruses for female voices by Brahms.

The eighth Concert of the Philharmonic Society took place on the 19th ult., the feature of the evening being a fine performance of Mozart's Symphony in E flat—one of the most perfect specimens of pure melody ever written. The programme was not otherwise particularly attractive, but included a first performance of Schubert's "Song of Miriam" and Hummel's A minor Piano-forte Concerto. In the former Miss Griswold rendered the solo soprano music with the requisite dramatic feeling, and the chorus did their work satisfactorily. The Hummel Concerto would have been tedious in almost any other hands than those of Mr. Charles Hallé.

A Classical Chamber Concert was given in the small concert room of St. George's Hall, on Saturday, the 23rd ult., introducing two of our foremost local artists—Mr. Ernst Schiever and Mr. Steudner Welsing. Their joint performances comprised Goldmark's Suite for Violin and Piano (Op. 11) and Grieg's Sonata in G minor; but the item apparently most suited to Mr. Schiever's style—which is excellency of technique rather than sympathetic power—was the Suite for Violin (in five movements) by F. Ries, which was cordially received. Mr. Welsing, who has made rapid strides in the profession, played the difficult "Variations with Fugue" in E flat, by Beethoven, with marked intelligence, and was also successful in his other numbers, an Intermezzo by Brahms, and Chopin's "Allegro de Concert." Miss Lena Little, a contralto of more than ordinary ability, contributed several German songs in pleasing style.

The fifth Concert of Mr. Hallé's present series, held in the Philharmonic Hall, on the 12th ult., furnished some of the most admirable specimens of instrumental music which it would be possible to conceive. Spohr's Overture to "Faust" is so well known that it will suffice to say its performance was in full keeping with the work. The Symphony was Haydn (No. 49) in D minor, and the fact that this was its first performance in Liverpool strikes home as somewhat of a reflection upon the neglect which has allowed some of the choicest handiwork of the old genial Maestro to remain so long dormant. It is to be hoped that now it has been once unearthed, the work will soon be heard again in this city. Next in programme order, although, perhaps, claiming the largest share of interest, was Mozart's Concerto in E flat, for violin and viola, and, with Madame Norman-Néruda and Herr Straus as the executants, it is only needful to say that its rendering was a marvel of technique and force. Madame Néruda also contributed the Adagio and Rondo Finale from Vieuxtemps's Concerto in E major, and one or two other selections calculated to display her executive skill. Mr. Clifford Hallé was the vocalist.

The name of Mr. Bond Andrews, although of Liverpool origin, is well known in the musical world as that of a pianist and composer who is making rapid strides in his profession, and the fashionable, but at the same time classical, audience which patronised his Concert, held in the small concert room of St. George's Hall, on the 18th ult., evidenced the estimation in which Mr. Andrews is held. The programme was mainly composed of the bénéficiaire's own compositions, which Mr. Andrews is particular to designate as belonging to the National School, although they bear unmistakable traces of German influence. The chief feature of the Concert was the performance of a duet for piano and violin, entitled a Sonata in G minor, in which the composer was joined by Herr Poznanski, whose execution is of a superior character. This was further demonstrated by his spirited rendering of his own "Scène et Grand Polonaise Triomphale," which figured prominently in the programme. The vocalists were all new to Liverpool, and included Miss Clara Miller, Mr. Charles King, and Mr. H. M. Imano.

The recognition of ability generally brings its own recompense, and it is to this that we must ascribe the opportunity which has again been afforded us of listening to M. Vladimir de Pachmann's phenomenal powers of execution. His second Piano-forte Recital this season was given in the small concert room at St. George's Hall, on the afternoon of the 16th ult. We have seen a more comprehensive programme than that presented, but the examples of Weber, Schumann, Raff, Henselt, and Chopin—in the last-mentioned of which M. de Pachmann excels—were eminently suited to the performer's special capabilities. The "Fileuse" of Raff, with all its delicate intricacies, was given in a perfect manner, and redemanded.

MUSIC IN MANCHESTER.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

AFTER "The Messiah" performances, which marked the turning point in our musical season, Mr. Hallé presented a programme rendered especially interesting, as including a Haydn Symphony previously unknown to us. It is stated that Mr. Hallé, being so fortunate as to obtain a set of orchestral parts, was tempted to score the work, in order to produce it at a time of the year when light, cheerful, and short orchestral compositions of the kind are in keeping with the festive feeling appertaining to the season. A repetition of the work has confirmed the impression originally left, of its genial, melodious character, which is entirely in accordance with the natural style of its author, so redolent of brightness, bustle, and gentle humour.

Looking back as I write, scarcely a month after the Concert at which the Symphony was first given, an interest of a totally different kind clouds the retrospect, and imparts a melancholy tone to the recollection of that Christmas Eve gathering. The vocalist that night was one from whom much was hoped; one whose beautiful voice and suave style seemed to need but greater animation and more artistic sensitiveness, in order to place his name high in the lists of the great vocalists of all time. Had Joseph Maas been voked to develop his full powers—intellectual as well as vocal—his riper years would have brought honour to himself and to the record of British singers.

The Hummel Concerto—like the Field Concerto in C minor, which we have since heard—excited interest chiefly by its somewhat old-fashioned formality and the rhythmic precision of its sections. It may, occasionally, be well to revive such works; but they are now listened to with respect rather than delight.

As large a crowd as ever assembled to hear the tenth performance of Berlioz's "Faust"; the dramatic poem, varied orchestration, and vocal freedom of which seem to await a popularity proportionate to the slow recognition of the great merit of the work. The cast was one to which we are well accustomed. To Mr. Henschel the part of Mephistopheles affords opportunities of distinction entirely suited to the peculiarities of his somewhat incisive style. At a later Concert, Mr. and Mrs. Henschel were heard together in duets from Goetz's "Taming of the Shrew" and Boieldieu's "Le nouveau Seigneur," and the same evening (the 14th ult.) an opportunity was afforded of comparing Raff, in his most sensational vein, with the rabid dreams of Saint-Saëns's "Danse Macabre," from the Poème Symphonique. I am ashamed to say that the latter piece was encored. Apparently the children had not returned to school, and their taste had been vitiated by Christmas dissipation. Returning to solid music, let us hope that "Samson"—given on the 21st ult.—may restore us all to health and digestive power. In that splendid Oratorio, Mr. Watkin Mills vastly advanced his position here, but the tenor was utterly overweighed.

Mr. De Jong has also been venturing upon Oratorio. The performance for the first time at his Concerts of "Elijah" was a bold venture. Unfortunately, Mr. Sims Reeves disappointed the audience by his non-appearance, and Madame Valleria by her indisposition. Miss Perry had to undertake the most trying portion of the duties of the soprano. The choir and band were fair, but the performance was a very unequal, and by no means a model, one in respect of finish or expression. Perfect knowledge of the work, and implicit faith in the Conductor, are necessary to an adequate rendering of so dramatic a masterpiece. At the same series of Concerts, Mr. Sims Reeves was, on the third evening of the year, received with the utmost enthusiasm by a crowded house. Mr. Seymour Jackson also received great applause for his singing of Blumenthal's "Evening Song," and Madame Clara Samuell interpreted several ballads with the charm with which she usually invests compositions of that class.

In consequence of the illness of Mr. T. A. Barrett, his Fortnightly Concerts have been discontinued, for a time at least.

At the Concert Hall, immediately before the close of the year, a large audience attested the continued popularity of Mendelssohn's luscious "Italian" Symphony, and showed the eager desire that existed to hear the young pianist, Miss Fanny Davies, whose reputation had penetrated thus far north. Miss Davies made a most happy début in Beethoven's C minor Concerto, in which she exhibited great intelligence as well as executive skill. In some numbers of Schumann's "Davidsbündler-Tänze," she also showed considerable power and rapidity of fingering. Miss Bertha Moore, who has before appeared at the Gentlemen's Concerts, displayed a voice that, if properly cultivated and guided, should prove a valuable endowment.

But the most interesting performances at the Concert Hall have been the Pianoforte Recitals, which have, after an extraordinary delay in their establishment, attained great popularity. It is very strange that the happy idea of tilting the pleasant and cosy little room for such really educational, as well as social, gatherings was not long ago conceived. Unsuitable as the place is for orchestral or choral performances of power, it is just the locality for chamber-music of all kinds; and there could scarcely be a doubt that, were good interpretations of high-class quiet music of different kinds given there fortnightly (or even more frequently), they would soon take rank among our most attractive and remunerative Concerts. A lesson, also, has been learnt with regard to convenient hours for such undertakings. There could be no sufficient reason why the Concert Hall should not be adopted as a place for afternoon meetings of most varied, but always artistic, kind. In addition to Mr. Hallé's Recitals there (which are always thoroughly well attended), M. Vladimir de Pachmann has given one performance of pianoforte music of almost all schools. But it must be confessed that, with all the delicacy of touch and the minuteness of phrasing of which M. de Pachmann is master, there is a persistent mannerism—not to say affectation—in his playing, as well as in his demeanour, which becomes very wearisome. A certain effeminacy of style characterised both pianist and vocalist on the evening in question, and materially abated the pleasure that many items in the performance would otherwise have excited.

On the 25th inst. we enjoyed an interpretation of Max Bruch's "Odysseus" and of Stanford's 46th Psalm, under the direction of Mr. Hecht, the choir consisting of a private Society (the St. Cecilia), of which he is the regular teacher. Except that an entirely amateur choir must contend unequally with a powerful orchestra of professional players, the performance was very satisfactory. Several sections of "Odysseus" rise higher than any other efforts of the author with which I am acquainted, and display a freedom of fancy exciting hopes which Max Bruch's later works have hardly realised.

MUSIC IN YORKSHIRE.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

THE programme of the third popular Concert, which was given on the 6th ult., in the Leeds Coliseum, was equal to most of those which have preceded it in point of variety and merit. That is saying a good deal, in view of the rare things in matters musical which Mr. Rawlinson Ford has from time to time put before his supporters. There have often been much larger audiences than that which on this occasion braved the snow and the wild weather. Mr. August Manns's famous orchestra so seldom visits Leeds, however, that serious lovers of music would submit to much discomfort rather than miss the opportunity of hearing it. Orchestral performances do not often reach to such a high standard of efficiency as those of the seventy-five players who constitute the band. As was shown in their rendering of Sterndale Bennett's Overture, "The Wood-Nymphs," they are capable of the finest effects in quality of tone, in delicacy and purity of treatment, and in precision and finish. In the region of absolute novelty, the Concert had to offer Mr. Prout's

Symphony, No. 3 in F—composed for last year's Birmingham Festival, and there received with much approval by connoisseurs. The third movement, in which the composer has not only attempted an experiment in the form of an Intermezzo, but has gracefully wrought out many pretty ideas, met with warmest appreciation. The work proved extremely interesting, and would be welcomed upon a second and perhaps more profitable hearing. The "Tannhäuser" Overture, with which the Concert was brought to a close, was given with vigour and telling effect. The horn obbligato of Herr Dutschke to the Notturmo of Mendelssohn's music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream," was an exceedingly clever contribution to what might be called the orchestral portion of the Concert. Herr Franz Rummel undertook the pianoforte part in Beethoven's difficult fourth Concerto for piano and orchestra (Op. 58), and the work was rendered with spirit, dignity, and refinement. Herr Rummel's success was also great in the performance of Chopin's two solos, the Nocturne (Op. 27, No. 2), and the Polonaise (Op. 53). His manipulation was strikingly facile, and the treatment generally was refined and thoughtful. The vocalist was Mrs. Henschel, who gave a Handelian Recitative and air, and her husband's (Mr. G. Henschel) three songs from Charles Kingsley's "Water Babies" (Op. 36). Mrs. Henschel's style and vocal quality met with much acceptance.

Dr. Spark's Free Organ Recitals, in the Leeds Town Hall, continue to hold their own in popularity and general attractiveness. Two performances were given on Boxing Day, at both of which the hall was filled. Selections from "The Messiah," and appropriate songs and solos were given by several vocalists, whose efforts were highly appreciated; the vocal selections being accompanied on the pianoforte by Miss Hinchcliffe, who also played two pianoforte solos. Miss L. Greenwood rendered two organ solos with much taste, and Dr. Spark's organ solos met with approval such as they invariably receive.

Herr Alfred Christensen has announced his intention of giving three Subscription Concerts in the Philosophical Hall, Leeds. These are to take place during February, March, and April. Herr Christensen will have the co-operation of M. Theodore Werner and Miss Emily Shinner (violinists), Herr Alfred Giessing (violincello), and Mr. Drake (viola); besides Mrs. Creser, Miss Fanny Sellers, and Mr. Charles Blagbro' (vocalists). The scheme is an interesting one, the principal works selected for performance including items from Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Chopin, Schubert, and Spohr.

Mr. Edgar Haddock opened his second series of Musical Evenings on the 22nd ult. in the Philosophical Hall, Leeds. Mr. Haddock has already secured many friends, and his second series will doubtless draw together large audiences. In this respect there was much cause for congratulation at the opening Concert. Mr. Haddock will have the assistance of Mr. S. Liddle, F.C.O., a careful and thoughtful pianist. At the Concert under notice, Miss Amina Goodwin was the solo pianist, and in the matter of technique left nothing to be desired. She rendered pieces which demanded the utmost facility of execution—namely, Rubinstein's Sonata in G and Liszt's Rhapsodie Hongroise (No. 8), both of which were encored. Mr. Haddock's violin solos were again an agreeable feature of the Concert, being marked by dignity and breadth of style. Among the pianists announced to appear during the series are Fraulein Marie Krause, of the Leipzig Conservatorium, Miss Agnes Zimmermann, Mr. Alfred Broughton, Mr. Owen Williams, and Herr Max Pauer.

The first of a series of Popular Saturday Evening Concerts was given in the Leeds Coliseum on the 9th ult., under the management of Mr. G. W. Lane, Conductor of the Manchester Philharmonic Choral Society. The programme proved exceedingly enjoyable. The vocalists were Mrs. Creser, Miss Ada Hill, Mr. Seymour Jackson, Mr. G. Wadsworth, Mr. Charles Kingsley, and the Leeds Arion Quartet party. The band of the 1st Gloucester Regiment, under the conductorship of Mr. A. Marks, gave several instrumental pieces. At the second Concert, on the 16th ult., violin solos by Mr. Edgar Haddock proved a decided feature of merit.

At the fourth Bradford Subscription Concert, which was given in St. George's Hall on the 15th ult., Cherubini's

Mass in C was coupled for performance with Benedict's "St. Cecilia." The latter was given as a tribute to the memory of Sir Julius Benedict. As usual on such occasions, the members of the Bradford Festival Choral Society sang the choruses, and the accompaniments were rendered by Mr. Charles Hallé's band. The principal vocalists were Miss Thudichum, Miss Hope Glenn, Mr. Lloyd, and Mr. Watkin Mills; and to these were added, in the double quartet of the Mass, Miss Norton, Madame Armitage, Mr. Mellor, and Mr. W. Riley, all of Bradford. Cherubini's work aroused much interest, though it did not leave that profound impression which might have been expected from a work of such dignity and seriousness of purpose. The performance was not uniformly perfect, the chorus singing being occasionally wanting in clearness and precision. The solos were, however, rendered with exquisite skill, and the audience relaxed into warm approval at the close of the duet "O Salutaris Hostia," sung by Miss Thudichum and Mr. Lloyd. The first-named soloist gave unmistakable testimony of great progress in her art. The Cantata was rendered with excellent effect, to which the admirable singing of Mr. Lloyd and the rich orchestral accompaniment contributed not a little. The chorus was as usual trained by Mr. R. S. Burton. Mr. Clough presided at the organ and Mr. Hallé was again at the Conductor's desk.

MUSIC IN THE WEST.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

THE usual Christmas panorama is at present occupying the Colston Hall, so that Bristolians have to console themselves with the hope of "a good time coming," so far as Concerts are concerned. We are, however, promised several musical treats later on in the season, foremost of which is the performance of Beethoven's Choral Symphony and Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise," by Mr. Riseley's band and choir, at the first Monday Popular Concert of this year, on March 1. Weekly rehearsals are now being held in preparation for this Concert, conducted by Mr. Riseley, assisted by Mr. John Barrett. Dvořák's Birmingham Cantata "The Spectre's Bride" is also promised, under the same auspices.

The great event of last month was the fiftieth Concert of the Bristol Madrigal Society, which took place on the 14th ult., at the Victoria Rooms, and was attended by the customary crowded and fashionable audience. Nothing special was done to celebrate this jubilee night of the Society, which was, perhaps, somewhat to be regretted, but a most excellent programme was provided, and listened to with eager and undiminished interest and appreciation throughout. The choir numbered 120 voices, divided as follows:—Forty-six trebles, eighteen altos, twenty-seven tenors, twenty-nine basses; and amongst those from a distance were Messrs. Bilton (Cambridge), Northway (Exeter), Archers (Windsor), Helmsley (Wells), altos, and Mr. Abraham Thomas (Gloucester), bass. The President (Mr. G. W. Edwards) and the Conductor (Mr. D. W. Rootham), who enters on his twenty-first year of office, were cordially greeted on their appearance. After the singing of the National Anthem, the following programme was performed:—"Merrily wake music's measure" (Barnett), "Like two proud armies" (Weelkes), "Matona, lovely maiden" (Lassus), "Have I found her" (Bateson), "Waken, lords and ladies pay" (Samuel Reay), "The Lady Oriana" (Wilbye), "Night" (Blumenthal), "Fire! Fire!" (Morley), "Who shall have my lady fair" (Pearsall), "Soldiers, brave and gallant be" (Gastoldi), "Thine eyes so bright" (Henry Leslie), "So saith my fair and beautiful Lycoris" (Luca Marenzio), "In the bosom joy and grief" (Mendelssohn), "Golden slumbers kiss your eyes" (Henry Leslie), "Sir Patrick Spens" (Pearsall), "There is a lady sweet and kind" (Ford), "No din of rolling drum" (Striggio), "Come, shepherds" (Benet), "The Waits" (Saville). Mr. Reay and Mr. Leslie were both present, and must have been much gratified at the reception of their compositions. The singing of the choir was marked by great precision and expression, and the esteemed Conductor may be heartily congratulated on the harmonious result of his painstaking endeavours. The only fault that might be found with this most successful evening was the too ready assent to the demand for encores. No less than eight were given, and we cannot but regret that the rule of "no encores" should not be in force at these otherwise delightful Concerts.

Miss Mary Lock, assisted by Messrs. Hudson and Pavey, gave her second Chamber Concert, on the 28th ult., too late in the month for any detailed notice to appear in this letter. The vocalists were Mr. Mansfield and Mr. Montague Worlock.

The Sarum Choral Society gave its second Concert of the season on December 30, when Mendelssohn's "Lauda Sion" and Mozart's Twelfth Mass were performed. The principal vocalists were Miss Kate Norman, Miss Georgie Booth, Mr. W. Howgate, and Mr. Percy Smith. There was a full band and chorus, Mr. Gambin being the leader, and Mr. W. P. Aylward, the Conductor. Mr. South (the Cathedral organist) presided at the organ.

On the 12th ult. a very successful Glee Concert was given in the Assembly Rooms, Salisbury, under the direction of the Rev. H. W. Carpenter. Besides the glee party there were several instrumentalists, including Mr. Alfred Foley (violin), Miss M. Hussey (violinello), and Miss Curzon (pianoforte). The programme contained one of Beethoven's Trios for violin, violinello, and piano, Handel's Sonata in D, for violin and piano, Corelli's Sonata in D minor, for violin, violinello and piano, and Marcello's Sonata (No. 4), for violinello and piano. These were, more especially the first-mentioned, excellently rendered, and it is hoped that another Concert of this kind will shortly be given.

MUSIC IN EDINBURGH.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

THE fourth Concert of the Choral Union took place on December 29, too late for notice in our last month's report. The Concert opened with the Dead March in "Saul," performed as a tribute to the memory of the late Lord Provost, Sir George Harrison. The principal items in the programme were the Overture to Schumann's "Manfred," Beethoven's Concerto in G, No. 4, for piano and orchestra, a Menuet and Trio in the olden style by the Professor of Music, Sir Herbert Oakeley, and Prout's Symphony, No. 3, in F, composed for the late Birmingham Festival. Herr Rummel, as pianist, fully confirmed the good opinion he gained last season, both in his performance of the Concerto, and in his rendering of solos by Mendelssohn and Chopin. Mlle. Marie de Lido was the vocalist, making on this occasion her first appearance in Edinburgh.

At the next Concert, on the 4th ult., the programme consisted of the Overture to Gluck's "Iphigenia in Aulis," Beethoven's Concerto in C minor, No. 3, for piano and orchestra, the introduction and closing scene to Wagner's "Tristan und Isolde," Raff's Symphony in F major, No. 3, and Sterndale Bennett's Concert Overture "The Wood Nymphs." The pianist was Miss Elise Fröbel of this city, who also contributed selections from Bach and Schumann as solos. Madame Valleria was the vocalist, her selections being Isolde's Death Song, a recitative and aria from Massenet's Oratorio, "Mary Magdalen," and Spohr's "Rose, softly blooming."

On the 12th ult., the same orchestra performed Dvořák's second Symphony, Beethoven's Concerto for violin and orchestra (the violin part being faultlessly executed by Herr Maurice Sons, the leader of the orchestra), Schubert's "Overture in the Italian Style," and Deutsche Tänze, and the Introduction and ballet airs from Gounod's "Reine de Saba." Miss Amy Sherwin charmed the audience by her fresh, young voice in a romance from F. David's opera "La perle du Brésil," and songs by Schubert and Lassen. All the Concerts were given under the able conductorship of Mr. August Manns.

On the 21st ult., for the seventh Concert of the Choral Union, the "Creation" was performed, the solos being entrusted to Miss Anna Williams, Mr. Winch (who replaced the late Mr. Maas), and Mr. Glencorse, a local baritone. The work was conducted by Mr. Collinson, and the choir, on this occasion, showed a great improvement on the work of last season.

Musical score for the hymn "Blessed are they that fear the Lord". The score is written for four voices (Soprano, Alto, Tenor, Bass) and piano accompaniment. The key signature is one sharp (F#), and the time signature is common time (C). The lyrics are: "Bless - ed are they that fear the Lord, and walk in His ways, and shall have His blessing." The score includes dynamic markings such as mf (mezzo-forte) and dim. (diminuendo). The piano part features a simple harmonic accompaniment with a bass line and a treble line.

MUSIC IN GLASGOW AND THE WEST OF SCOTLAND.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

THE religious observance of Christmas is decidedly making way in Scotland, though chiefly in the Established Church, and most commonly in the form of a musical service on Christmas Day or on the evening before. The occasion is also to some extent recognised by the United Presbyterians, who, though fiercely opposed to the establishment in the matter of relation to the State, have advanced equally with the latter in the improvement of the music in Divine worship. It is, of course, principally in our larger towns that Christmas is religiously, or, say, quasi-religiously, observed, but, at least, a beginning has been made. Musical services were held during last Christmas week in many of the churches in Glasgow and district, and some of the private musical societies gave Concerts, in which Christmas carols and other appropriate selections formed the programmes. A performance of "The Messiah," by the United Choirs of the Glasgow Foundry Boys' Religious Society, which took place on December 14 last, in St. Andrew's Hall, deserves special mention. There were four hundred choristers on the platform, together with a very excellent orchestra, chiefly of amateurs, but aided by six or seven of the Choral Union band, Dr. Peace being at the organ. The singing was remarkably accurate in tune, time, and phrasing, the performance being creditable in the highest degree alike to the choristers and their indefatigable trainer and Conductor, Mr. Andrew Myles, President of the Choral Union. Competent local professionals took the solo parts.

The Glasgow Tonic Sol-fa Society came forward on the 30th of the same month with a performance of Haydn's "Creation." Things have not been going on so well of late with the Society financially, but with the aid which was obtained by means of a bazaar earlier in the month, and by perhaps greater economy in the future, let it be suggested, in the engagement of solo artists, the Society may yet recover itself, and be encouraged to pursue its useful course.

The first of the two Concerts given every season by the Pollokshields Musical Association took place on December 30, in the Dixon Hall, Crosshill, the evening being almost exclusively occupied in a performance of F. H. Cowen's Cantata "Sleeping Beauty." The choir was well balanced, and there was present a small but excellent orchestra, which included a number of the Choral Union players. The music appeared to be very much enjoyed by the large audience assembled. The charming orchestration of the Cantata was of course a leading feature, and it was very fairly done justice to. The parts of the Prince and of the Wicked Fay were the most successfully rendered of the individual characters; that of the Princess was marked by intelligence, but unfortunately also with a degree of exaggeration which somewhat marred the effect. Mr. W. T. Hoock conducted.

The Glasgow Choral Union Concerts held on their course steadily during the past month, the performances being of uniform excellence, and the audiences always equally large. The programmes as originally announced having been almost strictly adhered to, and the particulars having already been given in THE MUSICAL TIMES, further reference to these Concerts is hardly necessary, except in regard to one or two important orchestral items, and also, of course, in regard to the choral Concerts occurring during the month. But I should like first to state the warm, and indeed enthusiastic reception accorded to Mr. E. Prout's new Symphony (No. 3 in F), at its performance on December 29. The general opinion is that the Symphony is a distinct honour to British musical art, and I have no doubt it will be gladly heard again. On New Year's Day the customary performance of Handel's "Messiah" took place in presence of the usual large audience, composed of townspeople and country visitors, numbers of the latter coming forty to fifty miles to hear the great Oratorio. The choir is naturally a little diminished in numbers at the holiday season, but its part of the work was done with the usual excellence, and under Mr. Manns's clear and firm beat, all went satisfactorily. The soloists were Madame Valleria, Miss Annie Layton,

Mr. Holberry Hagyard, and Signor Foli. A very fine performance was given of Raff's "Im Walde" Symphony at the Subscription Concert of the 5th ult., and at the same Concert, Madame Valleria fairly roused the Tuesday evening habitués, usually cold enough, into the warmest enthusiasm by her fervency and spirit in the Death song from "Tristan and Isolde." Dvorák's No. 2 Symphony, played at the Tuesday Concert of the 12th ult., met with a most hearty reception. There may be a redundancy of matter in the Symphony as many think, but all is so melodious and so skilfully mingled, and besides is so entirely fresh and original, that the work is likely to take an abiding place in the esteem of our musical public, which I can safely say is by no means, now, an indiscriminative one. At the succeeding Concert, on the 19th ult., the chief feature was Schumann's No. 3 Symphony in E flat, the "Rhenish," and though there cannot but be some difference of opinion with respect to the work itself, there can be none as to the interpretation of it. It was played with nobility and breadth, and with the warm sympathy we look for under the direction of Mr. Manns, who has done so much to make Schumann known and appreciated in this country. At this Concert Mr. Joseph Maas was announced to sing, and the vacancy caused by his lamented death was filled, on this occasion, and very satisfactorily, by Mr. W. Winch, whose chaste, artistic, and varied style was much admired and warmly greeted.

A performance of Sir Michael Costa's "Eli" was given by the Union, on Thursday evening, the 21st ult. The choruses, as might well be expected, from the comparatively easy character of the music, were executed without a flaw, but with a measure of neatness and taste that materially added to their attraction. The splendid quality of tone of the Union this season was again noticeable. Madame Clara Samuëll, Madame Marian Mackenzie, Mr. Harper Kearton, and Mr. Ludwig were the soloists.

Among the principal items in the Saturday night's programmes were Schubert's Symphony in B minor (unfinished), Haydn's Symphony (No. 14) in G, Berlioz's Symphonie Fantastique, Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony, and several other approved classic works which I need not specify, mingled with lighter pieces such as seem quite appropriate to the last week-evening of our busy community. Mention may be made specially of the successful appearance, in the Saturday Concert of the 16th ult., of Herr Ritter as a soloist on the viola. This accomplished member of the orchestra demonstrated most satisfactorily the suitability of the tenor violin (or rather of the form of it he usually plays on, which has been made to his own design, and which he designates the viola alta) as a solo instrument, and at the conclusion of his spirited and graceful contributions, in which he was accompanied by Madame Lasserre, he was honoured with a double recall. Mention of Herr Ritter's appearance in the capacity of soloist, reminds me of the very fine performance at one of the Tuesday Concerts by Herr Sons, the leading violin, of the chief part in Beethoven's Concerto. For purity of intonation, skilfulness of technique, and classic breadth of style, Herr Sons's rendering of his share of the Concerto was really all that could be desired.

A Lecture was delivered by Mr. Robert Carmichael, on the 14th ult., in the hall of Pollokshields Established Church, entitled "Mozart and Burns: a Parallel and a Contrast." The somewhat striking idea was wrought out very skilfully, and with no mean measure of literary ability. Vocal and instrumental selections were given from Mozart, and several of Burns's songs were sung by members of the church choir and friends.

A performance of "Elijah" was given by the Paisley Choral Union on the 15th ult., which, as regards the choruses, may be considered the most finished rendering of a work yet given by the Society. The present state of efficiency of the choir is mainly due to the untiring and gratuitously-given services of Mr. James Barr. Under such favourable conditions, together with the aid of the skilful band of the Glasgow Choral Union, and with a competent party of soloists, which included Mr. Ludwig and Miss Amy Sherwin, all guided by the hand of Mr. Manns, the performance was, as it could hardly fail to be, a highly satisfactory one.

The Hamilton Choral Union gave a performance of "Judas Maccabæus," in the Town Hall of the burgh, on the 19th ult. Remembering that the Society is not large, and that the sopranos were but few in number in proportion, it may be said that the choral part of the work was very fairly rendered as a whole. Mrs. Wilson-Osman, Miss L. Burton, Mr. J. Howell, and Mr. Andrew Black, took the solos. Mr. G. Paterson conducted, and Mr. W. H. Hood executed the accompaniments on the organ.

MUSIC IN AMERICA.

New York, January 12, 1886.

THE first week of the new year witnessed two events of great significance in the history of music in this country—namely, the first performance on this side of the Atlantic of Wagner's "Meistersinger" and the launching of the American Opera—an enterprise from which its friends expect great things. Both events took place on the evening of January 4, and when I mention that the American Opera presented a novelty of no less artistic value than Goetz's "Taming of the Shrew" (also for the first time in America), that on the same evening Kaiser's (not Nessler's) "Trompeter von Säckingen" was given at one theatre, Czibulka's "Amorita" (an English version of "Pfingsten in Florenz") at another, and the "Mikado" at a third, the readers of THE MUSICAL TIMES will be placed in a position to judge of the phenomenal activity of the present musical season in New York City. The Wagner opera was brought out under the direction of Anton Seidl, at the Metropolitan Opera House, with such a degree of artistic splendour that the musicians and dilettanti familiar with the work are not yet done wondering at it. Competent judges have not hesitated to declare that none of the subventioned opera houses of Germany have of late years presented it in anything like so satisfactory a manner. The only performances they are able to bring forward to maintain a satisfactory comparison are the famous model representations given in Munich under the direction of Herr Hans Richter. For this phenomenal success, the credit belongs largely to Herr Seidl. His merits as a conductor of Wagner's operas in particular are being praised on all hands, and lately have received recognition of a substantial kind in his re-engagement by the Directors of the Metropolitan Opera House for three years. They have also been honoured in a very unusual manner, the leading musical critics of the city having united in giving him a complimentary supper in honour of his marvellous achievement in producing "Die Meistersinger." It was the first time that such a thing has been done, and Herr Seidl was keenly sensitive to the compliment paid him. Mr. Krehbiel, of the Tribune, presided at the supper (which took place after a Concert of the Philharmonic Society on the 9th inst.), and among those present were H. T. Finck, of the Evening Post, Otto Floersheim, of the Musical Courier, Edgar J. Levey, of the Commercial Advertiser, Gustav Kobbé, of the Mail and Express, Edward Irenæus Stevenson, of the New York Independent, Mr. Hinrichs, Assistant Conductor of the American Opera, and Frank Van der Stucken, Conductor of the Novelty Concerts. Herr Seidl expressed his surprise and delight at finding so much intelligent appreciation of Wagner's works and aims in the American newspapers, and contributed to the pleasure of the occasion by announcing his intention next year to give the entire "Ring of the Nibelung." It also transpired in the course of the evening, that the managers of the Metropolitan Opera House are so well pleased with the success of German Opera, that they have agreed to make engagements with artists for three years, in the hope of thus securing only first-class talent for the German Opera Houses.

Of the details of the "Meistersinger" representations (of which there have been three up to date) it would be unprofitable for me to speak. The least satisfactory rôle, in a musical sense, was Herr Stritt's Walther, the most admirable Herr Fischer's Sachs. Herr Stritt's voice is much worn, and no longer capable of enduring the fatigue of Wagner's heroic rôles. Herr Fischer's impersonation, musically and historically, is almost ideal. He is the finest basso that Europe has sent to us for many years, and there is much satisfaction in the thought that since he broke his contract with the Dresden Opera to come here, and cannot accept a German engagement without paying a heavy fine, he, like Herr Seidl, will delight New York audiences for at least three years to come. Frau Krauss (the wife of Herr Seidl) is a lovely Eva, and Herr Staudigl a vocally fine Pogner. The interest of the German element in our population is illustrated in the fact that singers from the German singing societies give their aid at each representation by singing in the characteristic guild choruses of the last act. Yet, though the enthusiasm of the musicians in the city has been profoundly moved by the opera, I cannot help doubting its permanent success. Its merits as drama and music seem to be not only incontestable but resplendent; yet there is a want of sympathy between its subject-matter, the manner in which this is treated, and the American people. The pictures of German social life three centuries ago, the sturdy yet sometimes amusingly simple phases of German character, the absurdities of the Nuremberg mastersingers, all of which are presented to the life in this work, touch no chord in the American heart. They are merely historical studies. Then Wagner's music (the chief numbers of which had long before and often been given in our concert-rooms) exacts a greater technical knowledge than an average public possesses, and a different mode of listening than the same public is accustomed to employ. Humiliating as it may be to confess it, I yet think that, measured by financial results, Goldmark's "Queen of Sheba" will be more successful than Wagner's "Meistersinger."

Up to date the American Opera has given three representations of "The Taming of the Shrew" and one of "Orpheus" at the Academy of Music. Goetz's opera has won the admiration of musicians and critics; Gluck's opera, the warm favour of the public. The latter fact is due, however, more to the character of the performances than to admiration for the music. The absence of action in the play has been made up by extravagant attention to the ballet, a feature which culminates in an appended divertissement of the largest dimensions, employing no less than 140 dancers. The American Opera was called into life, with many protestations of high aims, and its achievements in "The Taming of the Shrew" were really most praiseworthy in the collective features, though a trifle disappointing in the singing and acting of the principals; it is to be feared, however, that the prominence which is being given to the ballet in its performance (one being even interpolated in Goetz's opera most inopportunistly), will furnish the enemies of the enterprise with much satirical ammunition. The orchestra is Mr. Thomas's, and Mr. Thomas, who has himself directed the performances thus far, has proved beyond doubt that the operas have been most admirably and thoroughly prepared. The ensemble work has been excellent, the chorus is composed of young, fresh voices, and the operas are mounted with a care and sumptuousness which were unknown to the Academy of Music under the Mapleson régime. The measure of support which the new undertaking will receive at the hands of the public cannot yet be predicted. One thing is certain, however; if the enterprise be carried on on the lines now being pursued, it will cost somebody a pretty penny.

Mr. Mapleson is now in Boston with his company, and has added Madame Lillian Norton Gower (known to the stage as Nordica), whose husband's death from a balloon in the English Channel has occupied the attention of the newspapers, to his forces. On December 23, a few days before leaving the city, he brought forward Massenet's "Manon," which he has since repeated in Boston. The success of the Opera, in which Madame Hauk assumed the title rôle, was confined to the liberal-minded musicians in the audience. The public remained listless, until the fine scene in the St. Sulpice, and after a brief enthusiasm relapsed again into indifference. The Thomas Popular Concerts have fixed themselves firmly in public favour, and fine audiences have attended them on Tuesday evenings and Thursday afternoons. Orchestral novelties make their appearance about once a week. The Philharmonic Society has thus far introduced us to Xaver Scharwenka's Symphony in C minor and Dvorák's in D minor. Neither was heard with more than respectful attention.

"LOHENGRIN" IN PARIS.

M. CARVALHO, the Director of the Paris Opéra Comique, has once more been called upon to reconsider the advisability of bringing out "Lohengrin" in the face of a recent renewal, in some of the leading press organs of the capital, of the "patriotic" demonstrations against the realisation of his project. Among the more influential writers who have participated in this re-opening of a somewhat tedious and unprofitable controversy, M. Camille Saint-Saëns occupies a conspicuous place. In a letter, published by La France, the gifted French composer strongly objects to the contemplated performance of "Lohengrin," partly on the ground of inexpediency, but chiefly on the principle of reciprocity; operatic works of French origin being, the writer asserts, studiously neglected in Germany. The latter assertion is an unfortunate one, not being founded on fact, and it has been promptly refuted by Le Ménestrel (a journal by no means addicted to Wagnerian leanings), where it is shown that out of forty-six works performed at Berlin between August 13 and December 31 of last year, no less than fourteen have been by French composers. Nor, as M. Saint-Saëns should be aware from personal experience, does Berlin represent musical Germany in the same sense in which Paris may be said to represent musical France. A far more violent objector to M. Carvalho's scheme, however, has appeared in the person of a lady, Madame Adam, the editress of La Nouvelle Revue, whose "patriotism," as her letter addressed to Le Figaro indicates, is synonymous with her hatred of Wagner. Not because Wagner is a German composer, but because he is, or was, in a special manner, l'ennemi de la France, must his immortal masterpieces be ostracised upon the sacred soil. And all the while Wagner's music is being applauded to the echo by French audiences at the leading Concert institutions of the capital! Madame Adam herself must be an occasional visitor at these performances, for she adds:—"When I hear the music of Wagner, I am conscious of the heavy tread of the enemies' soldiers, hearing their shouts of triumph, and the lamentations of our defeat." The two letters just quoted may be said to have furnished the respective key-notes to the more moderate opponents, and the opponents à l'outrance of Wagner in Paris. There are not, however, wanting journalistic voices of eminence who look upon this controversy as calculated to render the country ridiculous in the eyes of foreigners. Thus M. Martin, in Le Progrès Artistique, referring to Madame Adam's dithyrambic effusion, reminds that lady, in a pacifying tone, that it is not a question of erecting a statue to Wagner in front of the Opéra Comique, but merely of performing one of his operas inside that temple of art. And while upon the question of statues, the writer expresses his surprise at the lady patriot's silence in the matter of the recent erection of several statues to Voltaire, a Frenchman, who, on one occasion, congratulated his friend, the King of Prussia, upon his victory over the French, while holding up to ridicule the defeated army of his own country. M. Rochefort, on the other hand, in a spirited article contained in Gil Blas, proposes to allay the nervous excitement of French "patriots" by suppressing in future conversations all the adverbs terminating in "alement" (such as totalelement, finalelement, &c.) as bearing a disagreeable resemblance to the word "allemand." Enough, however, has been quoted on both sides for the purpose of characterising a controversy which may well be permitted to remain "localised" within the country whence it originated. If Wagner's musical dramas are, as it seems, to be excluded from the French stage for the present, it is the by no means insignificant number of thorough-going admirers of the master in that country who will be the chief, albeit innocent, sufferers. It would be a truly deplorable matter if the hostile demonstrations with which a portion of the audience greeted M. Saint-Saëns's recent appearance at one of the Philharmonic Concerts of Berlin, were to be regarded as anything more than an isolated instance of fanaticism on the part of a small section of the audience; happily without precedent in the annals of the concert-room of that capital, and unanimously condemned by the Berlin press. M. Saint-Saëns's compositions have, for years past, been held in high estimation in the Fatherland, where also one of his operas, "Samson and Dalila," was afforded a first hearing; and, his occasional anti-German utterances notwithstanding, he will doubtless continue to meet with fair play at the hands of amateurs in that country.

OBITUARY.

SUSAN PYNE.—The death of this once well-known artist occurred on the 5th ult. The daughter of an alto singer, Mr. George Pyne, and niece of the tenor, Mr. James Kendrick Pyne, she came of a musical family, but her more familiar relationship was that of sister to Miss Louisa Pyne, their public careers being very closely associated. The sisters made their first appearance in 1842, after studying under Sir George Smart, and met with great success both in solo and duet. They sang in Paris five years later, also with favourable results, the younger sister (Louisa) subsequently acquiring fame on the operatic stage. The elder and less gifted of the two may be said to have shared in this success, and, about 1854, accompanied Louisa to America, where an extended and fortunate tour awaited them. Miss Susan Pyne subsequently bore a part in the campaigns of her sister and Mr. Harrison at the Lyceum and Covent Garden Theatres. Her career though not brilliant was honourable, and she enjoyed general respect.

JOSEPH MAAS.—On the morning of the 16th ult. musical London was shocked to hear that Joseph Maas had just been called over to the majority. The blow came with startling suddenness. Mr. Maas had been singing shortly before in the provinces—at Birmingham on Boxing Day, for example—and, though it was known that his old enemy, rheumatism, had attacked him, no thought of danger affected the public mind. His more intimate friends, on the other hand, knew enough to be very anxious about him for a week before he succumbed. The rheumatism developed into rheumatic fever of a severe kind, and it became evident that a constitution not the most robust could only resist the attack at a heavy cost. On the day before his death, Mr. Maas rallied considerably. His physician expressed himself satisfied with the patient's state, and his friends hoped that the worst had passed. But the evening brought an access of fever, the inflammation reached the brain, delirium set in, and the sufferer's struggles precipitated the end by its disturbance of the already over-burdened heart's action. Many false rumours have gone about regarding the circumstances of Mr. Maas's illness and death. It is untrue that he caught a chill by sleeping in a damp bed, and equally beside the mark that the fever was complicated by bronchitis, congestion, or heart disease. The facts are as stated above. The news of the popular tenor's death was received everywhere with undisguised sorrow, and it is long since musical circles sustained so great a shock. It seemed hardly credible that an artist in the prime of life, and in the full flush of success, should be so suddenly cut down. Nothing more unexpected ever happened; but, if a certain adage be true, nothing was more likely to happen. The thunderbolts of Providence very often fall out of a clear sky. How deeply the musical public were affected appeared on the occasion of the funeral ceremony, which took place at St. Mark's Church, Hamilton Terrace, and Child's Hill Cemetery, West Hampstead, on the 20th ult. The church was crowded with amateur and professional musicians; a number of artists, including Mr. Santley and Mr. Edward Lloyd, assisted the choir of Westminster Abbey, under Dr. Bridge, and a profusion of floral designs from sympathising friends adorned the coffin and hearse. The funeral train, though not large, was representative. Besides the deceased's relatives, it comprised Mr. Roache Smith and Mr. Wood, of Rochester, the friends and helpers of Mr. Maas in his early days; Mr. G. H. Johnstone, of the Birmingham Festival Committee; Signor Foli, Dr. Bridge, and Mr. Charles Lyall, brother artists; and Mr. W. A. Barrett, who, with Mr. Joseph Bennett, represented the musical press. A large number of the congregation attended the procession to the cemetery, where Canon Duckworth completed the service in the hearing of more than a thousand persons, most of whom subsequently took a last look at the flower-adorned coffin as it lay in the grave.

Joseph Maas was born at Dartford, on January 30, 1847, and would therefore have completed his thirty-ninth year had he lived a few days longer. At an early age he became a chorister in Rochester Cathedral, where his beautiful treble voice was much admired, and is still remembered. His first public appearances in the concert room were made under circumstances not generally known. No biographer of the deceased, so far as we are aware, mentioned the facts that he was for a time a pupil of Mrs. Galton (the eldest sister of Miss Louisa Pyne), and that he was engaged by Miss Pyne to sing as a boy treble at her Concerts in the provinces. He was thus occupied when his voice broke. Shortly after leaving the Cathedral, Mr. Maas took a situation in one of the Government departments at Chatham, but the development of a promising tenor voice inclined him to a musical life. Happily he found a friend in Mr. Wood, the gentleman already referred to, by whose kindness he was enabled to study in Italy. Thence he returned in 1871, and made a first appearance at St. James's Hall as a substitute for Mr. Sims Reeves; shortly afterwards playing at Covent Garden as Prince Babil, in "Babil and Bijou." His next move was to America as second tenor (Mr. Wilford Morgan being the first) in an opera troupe organised, if we remember rightly, by Miss Kellogg. On Mr. Morgan's retirement from the company, Mr. Maas succeeded him, and remained in America several years, doing good work, and acquiring large experience. Returning to England, he joined Mr. Carl Rosa's company. Since then his career has been plainly before all eyes, and we need not pursue the record of his achievements. In private life Mr. Maas was greatly beloved. His friends used to say of him that he had a "good heart," and that was true. No appeal to his charity was made in vain, and his beneficent actions were many. His life was entirely blameless; all his actions were above board, and he took the most generous view of men and things. We have lost, therefore, an excellent citizen and friend, as well as a matchless voice and an admirable, always improving, artist.

The late artist's many friends and sympathisers will be glad to know that a project is on foot to erect, by subscription, a monument over his grave, and found a Scholarship, bearing his name, in one of our musical academies. A committee has been formed, of which Mr. Joseph Bennett is chairman, Mr. G. H. Johnstone, treasurer, and Mr. Charles Lyall, secretary. A circular will shortly be issued, and there can hardly exist a doubt of a hearty response.

AMILCARE PONCHIELLI.—Since our last number appeared, the composer of "La Gioconda" has passed away untimely. He died at Milan, on Saturday, the 16th ult. Ponchielli was born at Paderno Fasolaro, near Cremona, on September 1, 1834, entered the Milan Conservatorium in his tenth year, and continued his studies there till 1854, when he started his career as a composer. His first work, "I Promessi Sposi," saw the light at Cremona in 1856, between which year and 1867 he produced three others—namely, "La Savojarda" (1861), "Roderico" (1864), and "La Stella del Monte" (1867). These belonged to the numerous works which are continually being written for Italian provincial theatres, and, if the composer be young or unknown, attract no more than local attention. The next step was to gain a hearing on a metropolitan stage. Happily the chance arrived in 1872, thanks to the good repute acquired by "I Promessi Sposi," which was brought out in Milan after having been revised and, in part, rewritten. The opera made a great success, and Ponchielli saw himself in the enviable position so long desired. His next work was a ballet, "La due Gemelle," composed for the Milan La Scala (1873), and, we are told, "received with frantic enthusiasm." Another ballet, "Clarina," belongs to the same year, as does a Scherzo, or comedy, entitled "Il parlatore eterno." His three-act work, "I Lituani," followed in 1874; in 1875 he composed a cantata for the ceremony of Donizetti and Mayr's reinterment at Bergamo, and in 1876 he produced "La Gioconda"—his best, as it is his best known, work. "Lina" (1877), a resurrection of the early "La Savojarda," made less effect, but "Il Figliuol prodigo" (1880) had an "astonishing success." Ponchielli was known in England by his "Gioconda," brought out at Covent Garden in 1883, with far more success than usually attends modern Italian operas. Although the story offended good taste by its unmitigated horror, the public took kindly to the work, influenced by much that was beautiful and expressive. No more charming ballet music has been heard since Meyerbeer ceased to write. Still there was not enough in "Gioconda" to bespeak its author another Verdi, and since Italian opera ceased to exist in London Ponchielli's name has been seldom heard. The Italians regarded him as the successor of Verdi, but l'homme propose, &c., and the old master has outlived his junior. We may fairly condole with Italy on her misfortune. She still possesses the composer of "Rigoletto," but has lost the man who unquestionably stood next to him.

JOSEF ALOYS TICHATSCHKE.—On the 19th ult. there died, at Dresden, in his eightieth year, Josef Aloys Tichatschke, the intimate friend of Richard Wagner, once an operatic tenor of the highest order, who, in the earlier part of his brilliant career, also visited England, and whose striking artistic personality will not be easily effaced from the memory of those who heard him when in his prime. Tichatschke was born in 1807, at Weckelsdorf, in Bohemia, and received his first musical education at the Benedictine Convent of Braunau, in return for his services as an alto singer amongst the chorists. He subsequently devoted himself to the study of medicine at the University of Vienna, cultivating his vocal studies at the same time, the natural predilection for which, however, eventually led him to abandon the healing art for its psychological ally, music. After fulfilling some minor operatic engagements at Austrian theatres, he was appointed leading tenor at the Dresden Hof-Theater, which position he held for a period of over thirty years, steadily enhancing his own artistic reputation and that of the establishment to which he was attached. He was the ideal Tannhäuser of Wagner's conception, and in this, as in many other leading operatic parts, he has been the prototype of the most eminent German tenor known to the present generation, Herr Albert Niemann. The deceased artist had been an invalid for many years past, having retired from the Dresden Opera on a pension in 1870.

THE first public performance of the pupils in the Operatic Class of the Royal Academy of Music will take place on the morning of the 11th inst., at the Haymarket Theatre, by the kind permission of Messrs. Russell and Bashford, who have granted the use of the theatre free. The selection of Sir George Macfarren's Opera "Jessy Lea" for this occasion must not be considered as a mere graceful compliment to the Principal of the Institution, for the work contains such charming music that we cannot but wonder that it has been so little heard since it was produced with such decisive success at the Entertainment of Mr. and Mrs. German Reed. The Opera will be given with the full band of the Academy, and with complete stage appointments, the Dramatic Director being Mr. Gustave Garcia, and the Musical Director and Conductor, Mr. Ettore Fiori. The principal parts will be sustained by Mrs. Wilson-Osman, Miss Susanna Fenn, Mr. Lawrence Kellie, and Mr. Musgrove Tufnail. There can be little doubt that the interest of the event to the numerous supporters and well wishers of the Academy will ensure a large attendance. We hope that this performance, together with the fact announced in our December number that Sir George Macfarren has consented to forego his performing rights in both words and music until December 31, 1890, may have the effect of calling attention to this too-long neglected work, and that we may soon hear of further representations taking place.

THE following is a list of the candidates who have passed the recent Intermediate Examination in Music at the University of London: First Division:—William Kirkpatrick Hill, private study and tuition; Oliver Gold Smith, private study. Second Division: Cecil Julius Blacker, private study; George Edward Davies, private study; Charles Edwin Southern, private study. Examiners—Professor Garnett, D.C.L., M.A.; Dr. Pole, F.R.S.; Professor Reinold, M.A., F.R.S.; and Dr. Stainer, M.A.

THE first meeting of the City Glee Club for the New Year took place on Tuesday, the 5th ult., at the London Tavern, Alderman Sir Reginald Hanson in the chair. The professional members of the Club were all present—viz., Messrs. Lester, Brown, Coates, Walker, Kenningham, Thompson, Winn, and Hilton, and gave a fine rendering of the following Glees, &c.:—"Great father Bacchus," "Are the white hours," "Come, silent Evening," "Lovely seems the moon's fair splendour," "Hail, bounteous Nature," "Marked you her eye," "As the moments roll," "Come gather round the table," "There is a Paradise," "O Bold Robin Hood," "Maiden fair, O deign to tell," "Bacchus, great Bacchus"; Mr. Winn also contributing a solo with much success. Mr. Fred. Walker conducted as usual. The interesting feature of the evening was a presentation to Mr. Thomas Lawlor on his retiring from the Club, of which he was a founder in 1853, and for many years its musical Director. The chairman gave a short sketch of Mr. Lawlor's musical career, and ended by offering in the name of the members of the Club, and as a pledge of their affection, a marble Timepiece, bearing the following inscription:—"Presented, with a purse of £35, to T. Lawlor, Esq., by the members of the City Glee Club as a small token of respect and of their high appreciation of the valuable services he has rendered to the Club from its foundation in 1853."

At the Royal Academy of Music Metropolitan Examination for Artists and Teachers (1886), the following candidates were examined and approved, and are consequently created Licentiates of this Royal and National Institution: For Harmony, as teacher: Frank Meyrick. Examiners: Messrs. Henry Chas. Bannister, Ebenezer Prout, B.A., and Professor Sir G. A. Macfarren (chairman). For Singing, as performers: William Clark, Louie A. J. Gould, Henry Sunman. As teachers: Louie A. J. Gould, Margaret Morris. Examiners: Messrs. Frank R. Cox, Ettore Fiori, and Alberto Randegger (chairman). For Pianoforte, as performers and teachers: Louisa Barnard Walter, Frederick Schwieler, Frederick Wagner, Ellen Walker. As teachers: May Applin, Evelyn Harriot Davies, Henry Dunworth, Melora F. Goodridge, Eleanor Mercy Horsfield, Emily Gertrude Hudson, Albert Ingham, Lottie Maclean, Bertha McBlain, Ethel Frances May, Mary Parnell, Louisa Payne, Edith Phillips, John Edwin Senior, Herbert Walker, Edith Maurice Young. Examiners: Messrs. Henry R. Evers, A. Schlosser, and Walter Macfarren (chairman). For Organ Playing: W. Hayden Cox, R. Yates S. Mander. Examiners: Messrs. Henry R. Rose, E. H. Turpin, and Chas. Steggall, Mus. Doc. (chairman).

We have much pleasure in once more drawing attention to that excellent Charity, the Orphan School for the Daughters of Musicians, the Principal of which, Miss Helen Kenway, has worked unremittingly at her labour of love for some years, and now appeals earnestly for funds to purchase the house in which the School is carried on. It appears that the rent of the premises, 10, Darnley Road, Royal Crescent, Notting Hill, is £60 per annum, but that the lease of fifty-five years can be secured for £600, about £100 only being required for necessary repairs. If the Charity could free itself from paying an annual rent, it would indeed be a great boon, as the funds at present available are insufficient to cover the current expenses, or to admit of additions to the number of Free Scholars. Many eminent musicians and benevolent amateurs are already subscribers to the School, and it is gratifying to be able to announce that Sir Arthur Sullivan and Mr. William H. Cummings (who take the warmest interest in the cause) have kindly consented to act as Trustees for the Purchase Fund, and that subscriptions and donations may be paid to their account at the National Bank (Limited), Notting Hill Branch.

On Sunday, the 3rd ult., the first part of "The Messiah" was performed at the Royal Military (Guards) Chapel, at the evening service, under the direction of Mr. Richard Lemaire, the Precentor of the Chapel. There was a large orchestra and increased choir. The tenor and bass solos were sung by Mr. Harper Kearton and Mr. Musgrove Tufnell. The choruses were remarkable for their precision. There was a very large congregation.

It may interest readers to know that the beautiful "Helier" Stradivarius violin, which attracted so much attention in the recent Loan Collection exhibited in the gallery of the Royal Albert Hall, has passed into the hands of Messrs. W. E. Hill and Sons, this making the third time that it has changed ownership. The date of this specimen of Stradivarius's skill is 1679, and it was purchased by Sir Samuel Helier from the maker about the year 1734. It is one of the most perfect works of Stradivarius now extant, and is rendered still more remarkable by being one of the inlaid violins. It was shown to the public for the first time at the Exhibition of ancient musical instruments at South Kensington in 1872. It is of full proportions; in fact, of greater breadth than the "gran pattern" Stradivariuses. This, undoubtedly, gives it its great power of tone, in addition to its refined sweetness and purity. There is no question that, from a connoisseur's point of view, these inlaid Stradivariuses are the gems of fiddle-kind. It is said that there are not twelve known to exist. A link of the greatest interest with this violin is unfortunately lost. Until a few years ago there was with it the original letter of Stradivarius, showing the price paid for it, £40—a large sum in those days. This is an important fact, and affords a proof that Stradivarius was well remunerated for his labours.

For the Trinity College, London, Half-yearly Higher Examinations, just held, the following gentlemen have acted as examiners:—Messrs. John Francis Barnett, Henry R. Bird, F. Corder, and A. E. Drinkwater, M.A., Professor James Higgs, the Rev. H. G. Bonavia Hunt, Mus.B., Dr. Haydn Keerton, Dr. A. H. Mann (Cambridge), Mr. Maybrick, Signor Papini, Dr. C. W. Pearce, Dr. Gordon Saunders, Mr. Humphrey J. Stark, Mus. B., Professor Bradbury Turner, Dr. Walshe, and Mr. D. J. Wood, Mus. B. The diploma of Licentiate in Music, the highest granted by the College, has been gained by Emily Hagger (Trinity College, London), George Havelock (Scarborough), George T. Huxham (Birkenhead), Thomas Lee, Mus. B. (Cambridge), Sophia S. Taunton (Trinity College, London), Laura Marion Watts (Bishop Stortford). The diploma of Associate in Music has been gained by William Ball (Olney), Eleanor M. Barrett (Shepton Mallett), Charles E. Bryan (Southport), James Gallie (Glasgow), Walter R. Morris (London), George F. Potter (Grantham), Rev. H. O. Powell-Jones, B.A. (Cambridge), Jessie Scoones, (Canterbury), Henrietta Squance (Sunderland), Alfred William Tomlyn (Stirling). The Maybrick Prize for Ballad Singing was awarded to Rose B. Grosvenor Gooch.

The programme of the third of the series of Chamber Concerts, given at Bromley, Kent, by Messrs. F. Lewis Thomas and W. C. Hann, contained, on the 13th ult., little else than classical music of the highest order, Bach being represented by the Prelude and Fugue in B flat, Beethoven by the Trio in E flat, and Mendelssohn by the Sonata in D for piano and violoncello. The pianist, Mr. F. Lewis Thomas, received the honour of a double recall for a vigorous, no less than an accurate, rendering of the Prelude and Fugue; and being associated with Mr. W. C. Hann, the young violoncellist of greatest promise, a laudable performance was accorded to the Sonata. Mr. Lewis Hann, joining those artists in the Trio, contributed in a special degree to the fine interpretation given of Beethoven's work. Bottesini's two Concertante afforded the brothers Hann an opportunity for showing what good united practice can effect. Miss Marion Helmore gave an attractive rendering of songs by Spohr, F. E. Bache, and Sterndale Bennett.

A PERFORMANCE of Gounod's "Redemption" was given in the Protestant Hall, Sydney, N.S.W., on September 24, 1885, this being the second time the work has been heard in Sydney. The choir rendered the choruses very successfully, "Unfold, ye portals," "Forth the Royal banners go," and "For as the Christ," being specially worthy of mention. The soloists were Mrs. H. Colley, Mr. J. Thompson Brown, Mr. R. E. Callow, and Mr. F. J. Halliwell, all of whom acquitted themselves very satisfactorily. The band, though somewhat lacking in strength, was fairly satisfactory; and Mr. A. Massey and Mr. A. Fisher at the organ and piano respectively were highly efficient. A special word of praise is due to the Conductor, Mr. J. Massey, and his coadjutors, to whose exertions the successful rendering of the work is mainly due.

At the annual general meeting of the Musical Artists' Society, held on the 23rd ult., it was announced by the Hon. Sec., Mr. Alfred Gilbert, that seven quartets for stringed instruments had been received in competition for the prize of twenty-five guineas, offered by a lady member of the Society. That bearing the motto: "Laborare est orare" was commended; the one distinguished by the words, "Without enthusiasm nothing is accomplished in art," was highly commended. The prize was awarded to that bearing the superscription "Never say die," which proved to be the composition of Mr. Algernon Ashton. The Judges were Mr. Aguilar, Mr. H. C. Banister, and Mr. Charles E. Stephens. The prize quartet will be produced at the Society's first Concert in March. The Council for the year 1886, consists of Messrs. Aguilar, G. Gear, T. A. Matthay, Walter Macfarren, Alfred Gilbert, H. R. Bird, H. C. Banister, Charles E. Stephens, and Dr. J. Bradford. Mr. Alfred Gilbert was re-elected Hon. Sec.

THE Stockwell Choral Society held its first Annual Soirée in the hall of the Chapel, South Lambeth Road, on Tuesday evening, the 5th ult. The room was very tastefully decorated with wreaths, mottoes, flags, &c., and several objects of interest were exhibited. During the evening Mr. H. J. Bush, in the name of the members, said they all wished, by some method, to show their appreciation of the musical training they had received from their Conductor, Mr. J. Birky, and to thank him for his earnest, energetic, and enthusiastic efforts for the Society's success. Mr. C. J. Freeman, in a few well chosen sentences, then presented him with a folding music-stand, a Conductor's copy of Handel's "Messiah," Mozart's Twelfth Mass, and a Bank-note. Mr. Birky gracefully acknowledged the gift, and was received with warm applause. The evening was varied by the performance of a selection of instrumental and vocal compositions.

MISS ALICE ALOOF gave the third and last of her fifth series of Recitals at Brixton Hall, on Tuesday evening, the 12th ult. The programme, which was of an excellent character throughout, opened with Kuhlau's Grand Duo Concertante on an air by Spohr, for piano and flute (Miss Aloo and Mr. W. L. Barrett). The concert-giver met with well-deserved marks of appreciation for her effective interpretations of Schumann's "Carneval" ("Scènes Mignonnes"), Op. 9; Chopin's "Berceuse" (Op. 57); and "Norwegian Procession Passing" (Op. 19), by Grieg. Miss Aloo was also associated with her pupil, Miss Edith Rowland, in Mendelssohn's Allegro Brillante (Op. 70). Vocal soli were very efficiently given by Miss Edith Aloo and Mr. Franklin Clive. A flute solo was well rendered by Mr. W. L. Barrett, and Mr. John Harrison was an able accompanist.

A CONCERT was given at Gresham Hall, Brixton, on the 15th ult., in aid of the poor of the parish of St. George the Martyr, Southwark. The vocalists were Miss Kate McKrill, Miss Agnes Richardson, Miss Myers, Mr. Cundy, Mr. Sydney Beckley, and the South London Musical Club, all of whom acquitted themselves to the entire satisfaction of the audience. The singing of Miss Richardson and Mr. Beckley was specially worthy of mention, and the part-singing of the Musical Club was much admired. Mr. Frank Arnold performed two violin solos in an effective manner, his tone and execution being admirable. Mr. C. F. Reddie contributed two pianoforte solos, and Miss F. Cox and Mr. G. B. Lissant were efficient accompanists.

IN response to many enquiries for a practical school of music in connection with the Lectures to Ladies (King's College, London), at 13, Kensington Square, the Council has arranged to offer lessons on the pianoforte, violin, violoncello, and in the cultivation of the voice, during the term about to commence. The reputation of the College is a sufficient guarantee of the efficiency of the staff. The classes on the theory of music will be continued on their former footing.

THE Civil Service Vocal Union's second Smoking Concert of the season took place in the Large Hall at Cannon Street Hotel, on Thursday evening, the 21st ult. Amongst other items, the programme included a graceful part-song, entitled "Ocean Charms," composed by Mr. J. H. Maunders, the Honorary Conductor.

We learn that the Concerts Committee of the Working Men's Clubs Association have reluctantly decided to abandon the entertainments given during the last seven winters at the Hulme Town Hall. For the four years from 1879, the receipts and expenditure almost balanced, but for the last three seasons there has been a falling off in the attendance, which has resulted in a loss of £71 7s. 6d. The cause of this decline has been the establishment, under the financial guarantee of the Working Men's Clubs Association, of Mr. de Jong's Working Men's Concerts at the Free Trade Hall, which are on a larger scale, and up to this time have been very successful. The Association hope that the Free Trade Hall Concerts and Mr. Cross's Concerts at the Young Men's Christian Association Hall, will permanently provide high-class music for the masses. A series of Concerts given at Pendleton Town Hall resulted in a loss of £84 8s. 6d. in four years. At both Hulme and Pendleton the uniform charge for admission was twopence, and the number who attended amounted to 132,085, at a loss to the Association of £156 10s. 8d.

THE prospectus of the Wolverhampton Triennial Musical Festival announces that the performances will, as in 1883, extend over two days, the dates being September 16 and 17. On the first day "The Messiah" will be given at the morning Concert, and in the evening a new Cantata, written expressly for the Festival by Dr. Swinnerton Heap, entitled "The Maid of Astolat," will be produced. The libretto, which is based on the theme of Tennyson's "Elaine," has been written by Mr. Desmond Ryan. On the second day the morning Concert will comprise Dvůřák's "Stabat Mater," Beethoven's Symphony in C minor (No. 5), and Mendelssohn's "Lauda Sion." In the evening the second novelty will be performed, a Cantata by Mr. F. Corder, "The Bridal of Triermain," composed expressly for the Festival, the libretto adapted by the composer from Sir Walter Scott's poem. Engagements are pending with eminent vocalists, whose names will be subsequently announced.

THE members of the Brixton Choral Society (St. Paul's) performed a selection from Handel's "Messiah," on Thursday, December 30, at the Brixton Hall. The Choir and Orchestra numbered over 100 performers. The second part of the programme included "Hear my Prayer," Mendelssohn; "Splendete Te Deus," Mozart; "As pants the hart," Spohr; "The Heavens are telling," Haydn, &c. The soloists were Miss Mary Bear, Miss Edith Susetta Fenn, Miss José Temple, Miss Hepsie Cobb, Mrs. Thorne, Mr. Henry Guy, Mr. Firth, Mr. Thurley Beale, and Mr. Browning. Mr. William Sexton, Vicar-Choral, Westminster Abbey, conducted, and Dr. J. F. Bridge presided at the organ.

THE members of the Grosvenor Choral Society gave their 167th monthly Concert on Friday evening, the 22nd ult., to a large and appreciative audience, at the Grosvenor Hall, Buckingham Palace Road. The programme consisted of part-songs by Mendelssohn, Auber, Haydn, Stewart, Hatton, and Maunders. The vocalists were Mrs. Wilson-Osman, Miss Annie Dwyer, Miss Higgs, Mr. H. Martin van Lennep, and Mr. T. P. Frame. Mr. J. Edward Hambleton contributed two violoncello solos, and Mr. H. C. Tonking a violin solo. Mr. David Woodhouse conducted, and Mrs. T. P. Frame presided at the piano. Mr. Ebenezer Prout's Cantata "Hereward" is in rehearsal for the next Concert.

AT All Saints', Clapton, on Sunday evening, the 3rd ult., the Service was accompanied (for the second time at this church) by an orchestra, in addition to the organ. The music included Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in C (Gadsby), Anthem, "For unto us" (Handel), Carols, &c.; Voluntaries, "Cornelius" March (Mendelssohn), Pastoral Symphony, and the Occasional Overture (Handel). Mr. Henry Gadsby conducted, and Mr. W. M. Wait (organist and choir-master, All Saints') presided at the organ. The Rev. B. M. Kitson, M.A., vicar, preached the sermon.

A CONCERT was given at Poplar Town Hall on Thursday, the 14th ult. The artists were Miss Clara Dowle, Madame Raymond, Mr. George Snell, Mr. F. Peach, and Mr. G. H. L. Edwards.

THE first of a series of performances, entitled "Monday Popular Fortnightly Concerts," was given at Gresham Hall, Brixton, on the 11th ult. The most important item in the programme was Beethoven's Trio in E flat (Op. 1), the executants being Miss de Lucie (piano), Herr Kornfeld (violin), and Mr. W. C. Hann (violinello). An acceptable rendering of the work was marred by an oversight on the part of the pianist in the Scherzo. Violoncello solos were well played by Mr. W. C. Hann, and Herr Kornfeld's violin solos were received with favour. The vocalists were Mdle. Marie de Lido, the Countess Sadowska, and Signor Monari Rocca. Solos for pianoforte were creditably played by Miss de Lucie and Mr. Henry Parker, and Mr. S. R. Philpot accompanied.

A CONCERT was given at the Athenæum, Camden Road, on the 26th ult., under the direction of Mr. W. Henry Thomas, in aid of the North London Nursing Association for the Poor. Cowen's new Cantata "Sleeping Beauty" formed the first part, the choruses being sung by the Tufnell Park Choral Society. The principals were Miss Eleanor Farnol, Miss Agnes Janson, Mr. Dalgety Henderson, and Mr. Bridson. The accompaniments were played on the pianoforte by Mr. F. Lewis Thomas. The second part was miscellaneous, and included a violin solo by Mdle. Anna Lang, and a violin and piano duet by the same lady and Mr. W. Henry Thomas.

AN earnest appeal is made for a "Choristers' Cot" at the Broadstairs Convalescent Home for the sick children of the poor; and when we say that the sum required is only £25, there can be little doubt that the friends, relatives, and, indeed, all who sympathise with the young choristers who may some day need such kindly help, will add their mite towards the furtherance of so benevolent an object. Contributions, large or small, may be sent to Mrs. G. B. Wolesey, Lampton Lodge, Spring Grove, Isleworth; Mrs. Taylor, Strathern Rectory, Melton Mowbray; or to the Secretaries, Miss A. M. Thomas and Miss H. Wetherell, 27, Kilburn Park Road, London.

A VERY successful Concert was given by Mr. James Budd, on Tuesday evening, the 5th ult., at Brixton Hall. Mr. Budd's selections, which were received with the warmest expressions of approval, comprised Gounod's "Nazareth," and Roekel's "The Skippers of St. Ives," both songs being encored. The remaining contributors were Madame Worrell, Miss Alice Patten, Miss Fitch, Madame F. Winn, Miss Alice Bocquet, Mr. Henry Guy, Mr. J. Dalgety Henderson, Mr. Alfred Moore, Mr. Fred. Cozens, Miss Mary Chatterton (harp), Mr. Arthur Payne (violin), and Mr. Turle Lee and Mr. John Harrison (pianoforte). Mr. Michael Watson's choir also assisted.

MR. F. G. EDWARDS, Organist of St. John's Wood Presbyterian Church, gave his musical lecture, "The Life and Character of Mendelssohn," at the Union Church Lecture Hall, Putney, on the 14th ult. The vocal illustrations were well rendered by Mrs. Edwards, Miss Evelyn Gibson, and Mr. A. J. Mayers, and the lecturer played the lovely Duet in A flat from the "Lieder ohne Worte," composed by Mendelssohn as a love-song for his fiancée soon after they were engaged. Special interest was excited in the lecture owing to the presence, in the audience, of Mendelssohn's son-in-law and one of his granddaughters.

AMONGST other works included in the prospective announcements of the forthcoming series of Richter Concerts, are Beethoven's Missa Solennis in D, Bach's Magnificat, the closing chorus from the "Meistersinger," and the Choral Symphony, of which the two latter are to be performed in German. In view of the exceptional importance of these works, we learn that a reconstitution of the choir has been carried out, a measure which will meet with the hearty approval of all who have hitherto regretted the inferior standard of choral, as compared with instrumental, efficiency attained at these Concerts.

A MUSICAL Competition has recently been held in connection with the Manchester Sunday School Union, prizes being offered for the best hymn-tunes suitable for Whitsuntide. The first prize was awarded to William Spark, Mus. D., F.C.O., &c., of Leeds; and the second to Adam Watson, Head Master of the Township Schools, Sale, Cheshire.

THE Dedication Festival of St. Paul's, Great Portland Street, took place on the 25th ult. At the evening service the following music was admirably rendered by an efficient choir (which was augmented for the occasion), under the direction of the newly appointed Organist, Mr. H. M. Higgs. The Magnificat and Nunc dimittis were by Berthold Tours, in D, and the anthem comprised the narrative of the Conversion from Mendelssohn's "St. Paul." At the choir supper, held at the Holborn Restaurant, after the service, the retiring Organist, Mr. H. S. Webster, was presented with a purse of gold, given by the members, both of the choir and the congregation, as a token of esteem for his services during the past ten years.

THE 203rd consecutive monthly Concert of the St. George's Glee Union was given on the 1st ult., in the Piccolo Rooms, Warwick Street, under the direction of Mr. Joseph Monday. The part-songs were well sung throughout. The solo artists, all of whom were highly appreciated, were Miss Ethel Murray, Miss Mary L. Evans, Mr. Walter Mackway, and Mr. Walter Bolton. Mr. R. Randolph Arndell gave an excellent rendering of the pianoforte solos "Impromptu" (Schubert) and "Rondo Bohème" (Ritzler), and received for each an enthusiastic encore. Mr. E. R. Terry ably presided at the pianoforte as accompanist.

MR. ALFRED PAWSEY gave his annual Concert at Gresham Hall, Brixton, on the 18th ult., assisted by the following artists: Miss Marianne Fenna, Mdle. Marie Vagnolini, Miss Emily Arnold, Mr. J. Dennis Hart, Mr. Richard Mackway, Herr Volck, Mr. Walter Mackway (pianoforte), Mr. A. J. Kestin (reciter), and the male voice Glee Choir, "Ye London Glee Men," Conductors Mr. C. W. Perkins (Organist of St. Michael's, Paddington), and Mr. Richard Mackway. The singing of the two first mentioned ladies, Mr. Pawsey, and the Glee Men was greatly admired. The Concert was under the direction of Mr. H. W. Pawsey.

THE Annual Dinner of Trinity College, London, took place on Monday, the 11th ult., at the Holborn Restaurant. The gathering was both large and representative, and the event passed off with decided success. The Warden (the Rev. H. G. Bonavia Hunt, Mus. B.) occupied the chair, and was supported by Mr. Joseph S. Gabriel (Vice-President), Mr. Humphrey J. Stark, Mus. B. (Registrar), Mr. John Stedman (Bursar), Professor Bradbury Turner (Director of Studies), and Mr. J. A. Hammond. Several eminent musical professors and amateurs were also present.

A VERY successful Concert was given in the Alston Road School Room, Barnet, by Mr. H. Francis Gregg, on the 21st ult. An excellent programme was rendered in a manner reflecting the highest credit on the various artists. Mr. Gregg's pianoforte solos were played with much success. The other artists were Miss B. C. Becvor, Mr. W. W. Bishop, Miss Jessie Waddy (violin), and Mr. Lambert (flute), all of whom deserve a special word of praise for their several pieces. Mr. Gregg accompanied throughout.

THE Annual General Meeting of the Choir Benevolent Fund was held on Tuesday, the 26th ult., in the Chapter House, St. Paul's Cathedral, Mr. W. A. Barrett, M.A., Mus. Bac., in the Chair, when a very satisfactory Balance Sheet and Report was placed before the members present and the usual election of officers was proceeded with.

MR. HENRY LESLIE'S Choir announce two Concerts for the coming season on April 14 and May 27. We understand that the Choir rehearsals commence on the 9th inst., and that there are a few vacancies for sopranos and tenors. Application should be made at once to the Hon. Sec., St. Margaret's, Mitcham, Surrey.

THE Stormont Road Choral Society, under the leadership of Mr. Frank Idle, gave a Concert on Friday, the 15th ult., at the Stormont Road Lecture Hall, Lavender Hill. Miss Fannie Atkinson created a very favourable impression by her rendering of "From mighty Kings" and "Should he upbraid," and received an encore in each case.

THE University of Trinity College, Toronto, has recently conferred the degree of Mus. D., honoris causa, on Dr. Hopkins, Dr. Longhurst, and Dr. Lott.

THE Chester Musical Society, conducted by Dr. Joseph C. Bridge, gave a private Concert, by invitation of the Duke of Westminster, at Eaton Hall, on the 23rd ult., before H.R.H. the Prince of Wales, who highly complimented Dr. Bridge on the performance. The band consisted of members of Mr. Charles Hallé's orchestra.

MADAME EDITH DANIEL gave her annual Concert at Brixton Hall, on Tuesday evening, the 19th ult., assisted by Madame Worrell, Mdlle. Vagnolini, Madame Raymond, Mr. E. Dalzell, Mr. R. Odell, Mr. Horscroft, and Mr. John Harrison (pianoforte). Madame Daniel gained a hearty reception for each of her songs.

MR. F. A. W. DOCKER has been appointed Conductor to the Kyrle Choir, in the place of Mr. Malcolm Lawson, who has resigned.

REVIEWS.

Johann von Lothringen (Le Chevalier Fean). Lytisches Drama in 4 Akten. Dichtung von Louis Gallet und Edouard Blau: Musik von Victorin Jockiers.

[Berlin: Bote und Böck.]

THE story of this opera may be outlined as follows:—

ACT I. The vassals and dependents of Count Arnold, and his wife Helène, assemble at the castle to celebrate the first anniversary of that noble couple's wedding day. They cry "buvons" and "dansons" in approved style, extol the virtues of the lord and lady, and call down blessings on their heads. To them presently enters Ida, a domestic, in a state of terror, and calling aloud for aid. She has to tell that a marauding band of soldiers, bent on plunder and murder, have arrived in the village, and that they are the chosen guard of Prince Rudolf, Palatine of the Rhine. Some of the marauders immediately appear in search of Ida. These seize upon the women, telling the men to go home, and otherwise making themselves very unwelcome guests. In the midst of the orgie, Johann von Lothringen enters, reproaching the soldiers with their cowardice and cruelty, and ordering his followers to drive them away. This done he invites the peasants to resume their interrupted feast. Count Arnold next appears, warning Johann that he has used violence to the soldiers of Prince Rudolf, who knows how to take revenge. Johann fears nothing, and a dialogue ensues, from which we learn that the Chevalier, just returned from the Holy Land, is deeply in love with a beautiful lady, whom he is hastening to meet. At that moment the Countess enters. She is the beautiful lady. Tableau! But the Count suspects nothing, and invites Johann to stay awhile at the castle. He accepts, and the inevitable duet for Johann and Helène ensues, the Countess protesting that his death had been reported, and that she loved him still. But they must part. The Finale of the Act begins with the arrival of Prince Rudolf, who demands the surrender and punishment of Johann for insulting his soldiers. The Count refuses to give up his guest. At this juncture the Emperor Friedrich comes to call Arnold to arms with him against a foe. Explanations follow, and, in the end, Rudolf is appointed to rule during the Emperor's absence, while Arnold and Johann go with him to the wars.

ACT II. The scene is still Arnold's castle, where Rudolf, having Helène in his power, pursues her with his attentions. She angrily rejects his vows. Then Rudolf charges her with loving, not her husband, but Johann, and swears to be revenged. To this end he makes an instrument of Helène's page, Albert, whom he discovers about to serenade his mistress. Rudolf's counsel is significant—"To sing is good; to act is better." A lover should be audacious. Helène presently appears, and, without suspecting listeners, soliloquises upon her love for one whom she connects with a song sung at the beginning of the Act by the Page—a favourite song of Johann's. This is Rudolf's opportunity, and when Helène returns to her chamber, he persuades Albert that he is the object of her affection. Believing this the Page enters his mistress's apartment; Helène angrily reproaches him, Rudolf gives an alarm, Albert rushes out and is speared by the Prince, who has succeeded in compromising the Countess. He threatens her with the punishment of adultery.

ACT III. This act opens in Rudolf's palace. The war has ended, and there is great rejoicing, the revels coming to a climax with an elaborate ballet. A monk arrives and is received with ribald mirth. Rudolf commands Helène to be brought in. She is condemned for adultery, and now enters, serene and fearless, to the strains of a funeral march, while the soldiers wonder at her bearing. She then learns that her fate depends upon a combat to take place between her accuser and any knight willing to espouse her cause. The situation is that of Rebecca in "Ivanhoe." Rudolf proceeds to taunt his victim with the love of Johann and the death of her husband, and maliciously invites her to join in the resumed festivities. He offers her life in place of honour, and begins to use force when a herald announces the priest, and Rudolf exclaims, "Since thou wilt die, die!" The priest is of course Johann, who, believing Helène's guilt, has become a monk. It is easy to imagine the passion and despair of the scene which takes place when the confessor is left alone with his penitent. She does not recognise her lover, and makes an avowal of all her affection for him. Moved beyond restraint, Johann reveals his identity, and the two renew their vows. From this dream they are soon aroused. The funeral march is heard, and Helène summoned to her doom.

ACT IV. "Ivanhoe" again. Lists are laid out, the Emperor, Rudolf, and a crowd have taken their places; Helène is brought in, and all wait to see if a champion will come. The fatal hour strikes, and monks and people intone a "Requiem" for the soul about to pass. At that moment, Johann appears, armed cap-à-pie. He challenges Rudolf, overthrows him, and then, kneeling before the Emperor, avows himself a priest who has broken his vows and shed blood. The Emperor declares that God has acted through him, hints that the Pope can absolve him from his vows, and so brings all to a happy end.

It cannot be said that the situations in this libretto are new. Most of them have been used before in some form or other, and at least two are almost copies. Thus the scene in which the Page enters the Countess's chamber has a strong relationship to that at the close of the Garden Act in "Faust," while the duel scene is taken bodily from Sir Walter Scott. Setting this objection aside, the libretto appears to us a good one. Its interest is cumulative, its situations are varied, and its motives are powerful.

Turning to the music and taking a general view of its construction, we find a somewhat closer adherence to what may be called classic form than is now common. M. Jockiers' "unit" is not so much a scene as a "number"—a song, for instance, or a concerted piece. Hence we have airs, &c., which are distinct compositions with a beginning, a middle, and an end, like "Dalla sua pace" in "Don Giovanni." The composer has probably been told that in this he is old-fashioned, but we shall not follow suit. To us a distinctive recommendation of the opera is these set pieces, which do not interfere with dramatic development and are not thrust in for their own sake. Where action prevails, and a situation has to be carried out as in a play, M. Jockiers is careful to subordinate his music to that primary consideration, but when a fair opportunity for a full expression of sentiment occurs he uses it in a formal musical manner, and he is unquestionably right. The composer writes throughout with great clearness of method and directness of expression. He goes straight to the mark in the frankest manner, always using the human voice as his chief instrument for the expression of human feeling. Not that the orchestra is unduly neglected. Judging from the pianoforte score it is well employed, but kept in its proper place as the background of the musical picture. Furthermore, the composer avoids unnecessary difficulties, tending to confuse and distract. If his end can be gained by simple means he uses no other, and the effect in almost every case is to justify this course. His harmonic method is free, and he does not hesitate to employ the boldest transitions; as a rule, however, he subordinates all considerations of this kind to a frank belief in the superior claims of melody. That M. Jockiers is a facile inventor of tune can hardly be said. His melodies do not often bear the stamp of high originality, but there are plenty of them, and they are expressive, appropriate, and good. These, aided by the clearness and directness of treatment before pointed out, make close attention to the opera easy and agreeable. There are many numbers upon which we should like to dwell, particularly the duets for the lovers, a Saracenic song sung by the Page, the airs of Rudolf, and the very pretty ballet music. The Finale to the first Act is also worthy consideration as a well-built and effective ensemble. But the remarks already made will suffice for the present, and answer their end if they secure attention for what we take to be, as operas now go, a superior work. Mr. Carl Rosa should consider the claims of "Johann von Lotheringen," particularly as it presents a happy compromise between the classic and modern methods, and by combining the advantages of each, appeals equally to divergent tastes.

Harmonie et Mélodie. Par Camille Saint-Saëns, de l'Institut. [Paris: Calmann Lévy.]

M. SAINT-SAËNS has been so roundly assailed by some of his critics as a renegade in the matter of Wagner, that the present work is destined in part to fulfil the purpose of a musical apologia pro vita sua. It is in the main however a collection of papers chosen at random from his contributions to musical journalism at different periods, treating of a variety of topics with that mixture of incisiveness and lucidity which is the envy and despair of the English critic who takes the trouble of comparing his work with that of his Gallic brethren. A book such as that before us, written by a thorough musician, who is at the same time a cultivated man and a charming writer, only serves to accentuate the absence of such literature on this side of the channel. No one need be alarmed by the title of M. Saint-Saëns's book, for though he writes with a thorough knowledge of his subject, he never soars beyond the capacity of an intelligent amateur. The modern public, as the author tells us in his lively preface, has an insatiable curiosity to learn the views of artists, and if the latter are disinclined to publish them, the public kindly supplies the deficiency by the exercise of its inventive powers. Hence the growth of legends which die hard. M. Saint-Saëns assures us he is not sanguine enough to hope to overthrow these fables, but is merely desirous of addressing himself to those few ill-regulated minds who prefer veracious to legendary truth. With regard to his alleged change of front towards Wagner, he points out that in reality not he himself, but the situation has changed. Formerly, when Wagner's works were the object of indiscriminate abuse, he ranged himself on the side of Art against the onslaughts of the Philistines. Now he has chosen the appreciatively critical as opposed to the indiscriminately laudatory attitude, and hinc illa lacrima. The uncompromising Wagnerian will not hear of such a thing. It must be all or nothing. "One may change one's mind about Beethoven, or Mozart, but about Wagner—no, it is a crime or rather a sacrilege. We have no longer Art but Religion to deal with." While disclaiming all intention of dealing in detail with the growth and tendency of Wagner's genius, he thus tersely summarises his view of the matter: "The disdain for carrure (an untranslatable word) which did not exist in his first works, shows itself first as an emancipating influence only to develop gradually towards the close into a license destructive of all form and balance. Wagner is continually drawn on by that characteristic German anxiety to outrun reality; accordingly, in his instrumentation, he has freely availed himself of impracticable passages which can only be executed approximately correctly. The Feuerszauber in the 'Walkyries' is the triumph of this process. The result is very fine, but is it not dangerous to accustom executants to this sort of work? This method of approximation easily becomes a habit. In certain theatres where Wagner's repertory is often performed, the orchestra plays out of tune and singers sing out of tune, but no one minds; executants and auditors alike have got their ears demoralised." The recourse which Wagner at different times and in different works has had to widely divergent methods is met by his disciples, as M. Saint-Saëns points out, with a simple statement that it was his sovereign will and pleasure—scilicet pro ratione voluntas. And in this explanation he readily acquiesces, being above all things in favour of the liberty of art and of genius. It is only when, as a critic, he seeks to apply the maxim to his own advantage that an outcry is raised. We must refer our readers to his own pages for the scathing remarks upon the pretentious ignorance of certain Wagnerian coterie which are characterised not by a genuine love of art, so much as by a sectarian bigotry. An avowed eclectic, M. Saint-Saëns, as he puts it, can not unmake his nature or renounce his French standpoint, and his introduction concludes with some weighty words on the paralysing effect of the Wagnerian propaganda in France, words which are full of point to English readers:—"Young musicians, if you would do anything, remain Frenchmen! Be yourselves, of your time and your country. What is shown you as the future, has already become the past. The future is with you. Unluckily, as I said above, there is no art without a public, and the public is escaping from you. The praises of Italian and German art have been so loudly sung in its ears for half a century that it does not believe in French art. Announce the performance of a foreign opera and it will rush to hear it . . . but let works like 'Faust' and 'Carmen' appear, and it will wait until the universe has acclaimed them." So too, he adds, in spite of the worldwide fame of their theatre, its superiority is called in question, and Frenchmen are bidden to take lessons in the drama from Germany by—Frenchmen. This sort of patriotism he happily compares to that of the Trojans who hauled the wooden horse into Troy, and "gaily toiled at the destruction of their fatherland." The last words of the introduction are also worthy of citation—"I admire the works of Richard Wagner profoundly, in spite of their eccentricity. They are masterly and powerful; that is enough for me. But I have never belonged, I do not belong, and I never shall belong to the Wagnerian religion." The first paper, from which the collection takes its name, is full of sound criticism, and contains one especially admirable passage, which we cannot forego the pleasure of laying before our readers. The author is contending against the view that music is merely an instrument of physical pleasure, and supports his argument in the following felicitous way. "You know the 'Pastoral' Symphony; you have heard that peasants' dance which gradually works up into a mad giddy whirl. At the height of the dance all abruptly stops, and, without any sort of transition, the violoncellos give out, pianissimo, a note alien to the tonality. This note, which one hardly hears, is like the spreading of a black veil, it is the shadow of relentless fate appearing in the midst of a festival, an ineffable anguish which none can escape. From the point of view of the ear and its physical enjoyment, even from the point of view of cold common sense, this note is absurd, for it destroys the tonality and the logical development of the piece. Nevertheless that note is sublime. It addresses itself neither to the ear which likes to be caressed, nor to that purblind reason which feeds on phrases as regular as a geometrical diagram. There is therefore something in the art of sounds which traverses the ear like a porch, the reason like a vestibule, and goes farther still." That there is a physical pleasure in hearing music M. Saint-Saëns does not deny, but he points out that only inferior organisations and uncivilised races are unable to feel more than this physical satisfaction.

In the latter part of this essay the author shows how the French public have been at the mercy of literary men in the matter of musical criticism, and gives some amusing specimens of the dogmatic assertions of men of letters in regard to an art which, according to M. Saint-Saëns, they instinctively detest. But against this ignorant prejudice, as illustrated by remarks of De Musset, Diderot, and Augustin Thierry, we feel certain it would be easy to set scores of instances of kindlier and more affectionate references to music in literature. Still, M. Saint-Saëns has deserved well in exposing the injustice and ignorance of these dogmatic and captious criticisms, and hackneyed appeals to composers to be simple, easy to understand, and melodious. "They have striven hard to spread the notion that harmony is the product of reflection and of science, and that inspiration has nothing to do with it. How then is it that the men of genius who invent lovely melodies are also the only writers who invent lovely harmonies, and that it never occurred to any mediocre and learned professor to write the oro supplex et acclimis of Mozart's Requiem, which is nothing but a succession of chords?"

A genial article upon the performances of the "Ring of the Nibelungen" at Bayreuth in 1876 is prefaced by some general criticisms upon Wagner and his works, from which we extract the following anecdote:—"I witnessed one day a truly curious scene between the master and a charming lady, a writer of great talent and a thorough-going Wagnerian. This lady besought the master to play for her on the piano an unheard-of and indescribable chord which she had discovered in the score of 'Siegfried'—'O master, master, that chord!' 'Why, my dear child,' answered the master, smiling good-humouredly, 'it is simply the chord of E flat; you can play it as well as I can.' 'O master, master, I beg of you, THAT CHORD!!'" Of the Bayreuth Theatre, the disposition of the orchestra, and the execution of the work, M. Saint-Saëns speaks in the warmest and most enthusiastic terms, for if he excels in trenchant criticism, he also knows how to pay compliments in the handsomest and most unreserved fashion. Witness the following tribute to the merits of the Birmingham Festival Choir:—"Tunefulness, correctness of time and rhythm, delicacy of light and shade, charm of sonority—all these qualities are united in this wonderful choir. If the individuals who sing thus are not musicians, they achieve no less than they could if they were the best musicians in the world." As a proof of the catholicity of the author's taste, we may notice that his admiration for Liszt's compositions does not hinder him from according hearty recognition to Offenbach, to whom he allows "great fertility, the gift of melody, harmony of occasional distinction, a great deal of cleverness and invention, and a remarkable dramatic ability." But there is no uncertainty in his general verdict upon Offenbach's influence. "Without being a great musician, Offenbach was a great musical personality. His influence upon the taste of his epoch has been profound—disproportionate to the value of his works. . . . When one notices the worldwide importance operetta has asserted for itself, one seems to be witnessing a vast attack of madness in the human race, an outrageous dance led by the Mephistopheles of Humbug, the worker of decay. Operetta has done its best to dwarf and degrade everything, and it has succeeded, nay, it has gone still further; it has implanted in the universe the taste, the desire, almost the passion for all that is mean and low. . . . Assuredly the illustrious founder of operetta never had an inkling of its lofty future, and one cannot with any show of justice maintain that he coldly meditated and deliberately prepared his disastrous work." A short but excellent paper on "Poetry and Music," contains some admirable remarks on the setting of words to music. He shows how the old French Opera, from Lully to Gluck, was founded upon declamation, the musical accent never conflicting with that of the words, but that a contempt for scanion set in amongst the musicians of the last generation, followed in turn by a wholesome reaction under M. Gounod. "It is not one of his least merits to have recalled us to the great traditions of the past by basing his vocal music upon correct declamation." The false rhythms of opéra bouffe, M. Saint-Saëns traces to Offenbach, who instinctively applied German accent to French words, as he proves by quotations. This dislocation was taken for originality and faithfully reproduced by his successors. And yet with great impartiality, M. Saint-Saëns draws from the writings of a writer of this same school a most valuable illustration of the opportunities afforded by music for the reintroduction of the characteristic rhythms of classical poetry. To the instance quoted on p. 265 we can add another, where, in M. Gounod's "Redemption," the words unrésistant, incompainable, are treated as anapaests, with a most charming effect. Another short but interesting paper, entitled "Le Répertoire," deals in effective fashion with the system of cuts, alterations, and mutilations. We seem to be listening to Berlioz when we read the following passage, with which we must take leave of this charming volume for the present:—"The public, when it is present at the performance of an opera, ingenuously believes that it is being executed in its integrity. It has no notion of all the mediums, more or less transparent, which are interposed between it, the public, and the thought of the author. This thought for the great part is only presented in a veiled and unrecognisable form; it often does not even appear at all, as so frequently happens in the case of barbarous 'cuts,' regular mutilations which ought to be forbidden by law. 'That which is cut out is never hissed,' they say, and cut it accordingly without reflecting that what is cut is never applauded either."

La Musique au Pays de Brouillards. Etude humoristique et anecdotique de l'état actuel de la Musique en Angleterre, par Félix Rémo.

It is not the fault of the strangers within our gates if we do not know what they think of us. These gentlemen speak with perfect frankness, and so season the dish of hard facts with the spice of amusing blunders that it is impossible to be angry. But, for that matter, anger does not enter into the mind of an Englishman when his nation is satirised. He rather likes the process than otherwise, perhaps because it is so pleasant to fit the cap upon the heads of his friends and neighbours. For the same reason he loves denunciatory sermons. The most recent of our candid foreign critics is a gentleman calling himself Félix Rémo—evidently a musical artist of long residence among us, and one who knows a good deal about his subject, though he has not yet learned to separate the wheat of truth from the tares of error. Sooth to say, M. Rémo makes many blunders, not the least serious being those in which it is clear that he has looked at persons and things through a medium destructive of their true proportions, making the insignificant appear great. Nevertheless, the book is not without its uses as a reflector, and even where it distorts it provokes to healthy laughter.

M. Rémo treats his theme in three grand divisions, devoting the first to amateurs, whom he satirises in ten chapters. Our critic is very hard upon the amateurs, and does not always keep himself within the limits of good taste. These are clearly overstepped when private individuals—private as regards music—are referred to in uncomplimentary terms. Even the Queen does not escape. He thinks the young Princesses of Wales are being taught the piano badly by people who bow respectfully before the false notes of Royalty, and he opines that Madame Napoleone Voarino should be engaged instead. Madame Voarino appears to be one of our author's friends. Naturally, M. Rémo has much to say about the Duke of Edinburgh; he insists that the Duke of Connaught studies the side drum, and declares that Prince Henry of Battenberg once held a violin at a Passion Play performance in Bayreuth! So history is made. Our social arrangements with regard to Sunday music come in for M. Rémo's most scathing remarks, though it is admitted that we are improving. About our drawing-room music he has funny things to say, and he smites the amateurs even as Samuel smote the Amalekites. In his invectives against our system, or no system, of musical education, there is an unpleasant amount of truth. He represents it as an organised hypocrisy, intended to deceive by parading merely superficial acquirements. The chapter on our "musical prejudices" may fairly be described as more amusing than true. It is not even consistent with M. Rémo himself, for in one place he describes us as preferring foreign artists, and in another as setting ourselves before all the world. An almost ludicrous sequel to this is the chapter on amateur composers. He admits that some of these really write their own music, and mentions several names not hitherto blazoned forth as representative. We do not for a moment doubt that Miss Louisa Vance, Miss Frances Reed, Miss Alice Sheppard, Mrs. Colquhoun, and Mrs. Bristowe deserve everything said in their favour, and the public should be thankful for learning of their existence, as well as that of Major John Gollop, Colonel Douglas, and Mr. Batton. Amateur orchestras and street music next pass in review, and are treated in the "touch and go" style peculiar to our foreign censors, who seem to regard the exercise of their vocation in the light of a farcical performance—which indeed it is—primarily designed to raise a laugh.

No fewer than twenty-five chapters are included in the second division, which deals with professional musicians. Professional education, we are told, is in a bad way. There are serious academies and others described as simple speculations; even the serious ones being established and worked on wrong principles. The Royal Academy takes in everybody that comes with sufficient money, and so on, and so on. As for the Guildhall School of Music, our author seems to owe it a special grudge, and pours a stream of satire upon its devoted head. The aldermen do not escape, but are represented as looking at the School from the top of a majestic stomach, and saying: "We have the greatest music academy in the world. We have 3,000 pupils. Boston has only 2,000; Paris, 670; the German Conservatories from 200 to 600; the Royal Academy 550, and the Royal College 160. We have the greatest school in the world!" Then they take a pinch of snuff and go back to gormandising. We would willingly amuse our readers with M. Rémo's lively, sometimes ill-natured, remarks upon professors, scholarships, testimonials, degrees, and artists. Touching the last-named he bestows kicks and compliments on principles difficult to understand. Madame Liebhart and Mdlle. Enequist are praised along with "Mr. Stanley (sic), the baritone," "le beau Maas," and Lloyd, "whom it is an infinite pleasure to hear." Cummings is a "very fine singer," so is Bernard Lane; Shakespeare is a "great favourite"; and George Cox, the true English ténor-léger. In this highly-piggledy manner does M. Rémo scatter his favours. Composers, foreign professors, concerts, concert-tours, theatre-music, minstrels, and music-halls next pass in entertaining review, and so on into the third division, where biographical sketches are given of such musical luminaries as Madame Hughes-Paltzer, Madame Friggeri, Edward Calm, Ivan Caryll, and Gina Fitzgerald, whoever they may be.

With all its inaccuracies and bad taste, the book should be read. M. Rémo is shrewd, if not always well informed, and he puts his finger on a good many weak points in our musical system.

† The Church Organist. By Charles Collin. Books IV. & VIII. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

It is nearly twenty years since the earlier books of M. Charles Collin's organ compositions were published, and organists had probably given up all hope of any further instalments. However, here are five more books, the contents of the last two being published for the first time in any country. The composer is organist of the Cathedral of St. Brieu, and his works are mostly for the church, including three Cantatas, Litanies, Motets, &c. Those English organists who entertain strong convictions that music written for the king of instruments should be stately and dignified, and who, therefore, barely tolerate Wely and Batiste, will not find the element of frivolity in M. Collin's pieces. The nationality of the composer betrays itself frequently in melodic turns and figures of accompaniment, but the work is equally divided between the two hands, and the pedal part is something more than a series of staccato, isolated notes like the bass of a waltz or a polka. It would occupy too much space to speak in detail of the contents of the five books now before us. Among the most attractive pieces are a Grand Chœur in C, in Book 4; an Allegretto in A, and an Allegro-Fanfare in G, in Book 6; a March in D, in Book 7; and an elaborate Te Deum in Book 8.

Richard Wagner: Entwürfe, Gedanken, Fragmente. Aus nachgelassenen Papieren Zusammengestellt. [Leipzig: Breitkopf und Härtel, 1885.]

THOSE—and their number is doubtless considerable—who may be desirous of obtaining a glimpse at the mental laboratory of Richard Wagner will find their curiosity gratified in the pages of this volume. It presents a collection of all the chips, however slight, which could be gathered from the workshop of an ever-active mind, including the fragment of an essay, "Ueber das Weibliche im Menschlichen" (On the feminine element in the progress of Humanity), upon which his pen had been engaged within two days of the time when the hand that had so often wielded it to undying purpose was finally stayed. They are memoranda, for the greater part, hastily jotted down ideas, many of which form the basis of, or have been utilised in, the master's subsequent publications. But who shall say how much or how little of these mere fragments is worth preserving, or which of them may or may not prove eventually of some importance, when the life and work of this remarkable man of genius shall come to be ultimately gauged at their true significance? Although, therefore, the present volume adds but little to our previous acquaintance with the poet-composer's æsthetic principles and literary personality, we think that Messrs. Breitkopf and Härtel have acted at once judiciously and in a commendable spirit of reverence in publishing it. Among the more finished sketches contained therein, the brief commentaries to the preludes of "Die Meistersinger" (third act), "Tristan und Isolde," and "Parsifal" will no doubt command general interest. There is also the faint outline of a music-drama, "Die Sieger" (dated May, 1856), founded upon a subject from Hindoo mythology, and regarding which various reports had obtained currency during the last few years of the master's life. The compiler of the elaborate index attached to this posthumous publication has done his work admirably, every single paragraph being here registered, and, where possible, referred to volume and page of the previously published writings in which the respective subject or idea may be found enlarged upon. Those readers, however, who may not have either the time or the inclination to wade through the not unfrequently tedious and abstruse pages of the ten tomes comprising the literary labour of Richard Wagner, will, in glancing through the present supplement thereto, gain a tolerably clear insight into the astounding fertility of his intellect and the ideality of his aspirations.

The Tournament. A Dramatic Cantata for Soli, Chorus, and Orchestra. Libretto by Walter Spinney; Music by John Storer, Mus. Bac., Oxon. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THE composer of this Cantata has chosen a subject which lends itself well to musical setting, the "Argument" being thus stated: "Mellett, the eldest daughter of Peverell, the Lord of Whittington, declared she would marry no one but a knight who had distinguished himself by his prowess in the field. Her father, admiring her spirit, proclaimed a tournament at 'Peverell's Place, in the Peke,' to which all young men of noble birth were invited to enter the lists, and make trial of their skill and valour. The prize was Mellett as a wife, together with the castle and domain of Whittington as her dower. Amongst the competitors was a Knight of Lorraine, with a maiden shield of silver, and a peacock for a crest. This unknown knight won the fair Mellett, after vanquishing a Knight of Burgundy and a Prince of Scotland." Here is a little Drama, the incidents of which, fairly verified by Mr. Spinney, have received an effective musical colouring from Mr. Storer. No doubt the instrumentation is absolutely essential for the full realisation of the composer's intention, but as an unpretentious drawing-room Cantata, with pianoforte accompaniment, we may commend it to the notice of amateurs. Opening with a proclamation from the Herald, followed by a chorus of martial character, we have a Recitative and Air for the heroine, alternating between A major and minor, and containing some extremely melodious phrases, always well and appropriately accompanied. This is followed by a stirring bass song in A minor, a somewhat conventional short March, with chorus of Armourers and attendant Maidens—including some excellent dramatic points—a Recitative and Air for the Herald, and a chorus descriptive of the Tournament, in which the unknown knight vanquishes his formidable antagonists. A placid and attractive Trio, which succeeds this, contrasts well with the preceding chorus, and deserves warm praise not only for its vocal merits, but for the effective weaving in of the accompaniment. The final chorus fairly serves the purpose of bringing the work to a satisfactory termination. Without aiming high in the composition of this Cantata, Mr. Storer has supplied us with a work which, whilst it will certainly please every amateur, cannot fail to be regarded with favour by more exacting critics.

There be none of Beauty's Daughters. Song. Words by Lord Byron. Music by Maude Valérie White. [Tito di Gio. Ricordi.]

THERE is always something interesting in the vocal compositions of Miss White; for, never having cultivated the "pretty song" style of writing, we know that her appeals are to an artistic ear, and that her work is a spontaneous musical colouring of the words, for voice and pianoforte. Byron's poetry has tempted many composers before, but the setting now before us is one of the most sympathetic we have seen. Commencing with a symphony in D minor, the arpeggios which accompany the melody are carried on when the voice begins, an unexpected change of key giving much effect to the text. The long holding D for the voice (treated as the fifth of the chord of G minor), with the final phrase in the original key, on the words "and the lulled winds seem dreaming," may be cited as really beautiful points in a highly meritorious song.

Flow down, cold rivulet. Trio for female voices. Poetry by Lord Tennyson. Composed by Luard Selby.

Morning Hymn. Chorus of Priestesses from the Opera "La Vestale." English version by the Rev. Dr. Troutbeck. Music by Spontini.

Quiet Hours. Trio for female voices. Poetry by E. Saxby. Composed by R. B. Addison.
[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THESE three pieces are published in Novello's Collection of Trios, Quartets, &c., for female voices, and will be welcome additions to the store of such compositions especially suited for drawing-room performance. Mr. Selby's Trio, if somewhat overlaid in the accompaniment, is well written, effective, and sympathetic with the words in the voice parts. Spontini's Chorus from "La Vestale" is so full of dramatic feeling as to need no recommendation on our part. A good pianist will be required to do full justice to the intention of the composer; and something more than the correct singing of the notes is demanded from the singers. In its way, it is a perfect little gem. "Quiet Hours" is a good specimen of an unpretentious Trio. The words are happily expressed throughout, and the flowing accompaniment brightens, without interfering with, the voices. Mr. Addison has evidently been trained in a good school.

Barcarole. From the Fourth Concerto of Sterndale Bennett. Arranged for the organ by E. M. Lott.
[E. Ashdown.]

THIS lovely movement has long been a favourite with organists, and no doubt Mr. Lott thinks there is room for another arrangement. He has carried out his task in an artistic spirit on the whole, though in a few matters of detail there is room for question. The use of the high F on the pedals (a note not always to be found) in the principal subject is objectionable, and on how many organs will Mr. Lott find an 8-foot trumpet on the pedals?

Ten Songs for Children. Written by Edward Oxenford and Henry Hersee. Composed by Carl Reinecke.
[Forsyth Brothers.]

THE melodious flow of the verses of these songs fits them admirably for simple musical setting, and it need scarcely be said that Herr Reinecke, in contributing his share to this "Children's Offering," has proved himself a true friend to the little vocalists for whom he writes. No. 2, "The Five"; No. 3, "Where are you going, my pretty maid?"; No. 6, "Ding dong, bell"; No. 9, "The Birthday congratulations"; and No. 10, "The Sleigh Ride in the Room"—with the attractive glissando passages for pianoforte—may be especially commended. The accompaniments offer no difficulties, even to very young pianists.

Queen of the May. Cantata for ladies' voices. Composed by Alfred J. Caldicott, Mus. Bac., Cantab.
[Weekes and Co.]

THE subject of this Cantata is sufficiently explained by its title; and although the incident has so often been treated both by poets and musicians, Mr. Caldicott's setting has every right to take a high place, not only by its simple melodiousness, but by the truly artistic feeling which asserts itself, without obtrusion, throughout the work. We do not know whether the composer is responsible for the words, but we may say that they flow smoothly enough for the unpretending music to which they are wedded, although we could wish that in some parts they were a little less conventional. Neither in the vocal nor the instrumental part will the powers of the executants be much taxed; but in drawing-room Cantatas, especially for ladies' voices, this can be scarcely considered an objection; and in proof that the composer has endeavoured to meet any difficulty which may stand in the way of a performance of the Cantata by amateurs, he tells us that if, in the opening chorus, three voice parts cannot be procured, the lower part may be omitted. The little song "Tis even so," the duet "How quickly doth the daylight fade," the Processional March and Chorus, and the Finale, "Round the Maypole," may be cited as good specimens of the simple and pleasing style of the work, which we conscientiously recommend for small gatherings, where there may be some desire to escape the gushingly sentimental or mournful vocal effusions which too often form the répertoire of a "musical evening."

O Lady, leave thy silken thread. Trio for female voices. Words by Thomas Hood. Music by Stephen Kemp.
[Stanley Lucas, Weber and Co.]

THIS is one of the most graceful little part-songs we have seen for some time, and will certainly prove most acceptable to female singers who can do justice to its merits. The melodious flow of the voice parts (with here and there some effective passages of imitation) most sympathetically colours Hood's charming verses, which indeed are in themselves instinct with musical feeling. The change from E into C major at the poco meno mosso may be cited as one amongst many points worthy of praise.

Album of Six Songs. Composed by Whewall Bowling.
[Marriott and Williams.]

THESE six songs so evidently evince not only a decided feeling for melody in their composer (whose name is new to us), but a desire to escape from the ordinary groove of pretty song writing, that we may conscientiously recommend them to the attention of vocalists. We cannot altogether acquit Mr. Bowling from the charge of occasionally degenerating into ungraceful phrasing in the voice part in order to persevere with a figure in the accompaniment, but these figures are generally abstractedly attractive; and it is by no means easy to write a perfect song for voice and pianoforte where both shall be indissolubly united. No. 1, "Come thou to me" (words by Elizabeth H. Whiteman); No. 2, "From afar" (words by "A. M. H."); No. 4, "My tears are mine alone" (words by Aubrey de Vere), and No. 6, "Farewell" (words by Heber) are, in our opinion, the most spontaneous compositions of the set; Nos. 1 and 4 being especially sympathetic with the verses.

Over the sea our galleys went. Chorus for Male Voices. Words by Robert Browning. Music by Ethel Harraden.
[C. Jefferys.]

IF well sung, this composition could not fail to prove successful; but Miss Harraden has been somewhat unmerciful in her vocal writing, and should not, therefore, complain if her very clever musical ideas are not satisfactorily realised. We are, indeed, very much pleased with many points in this work, and shall be glad again to meet with so promising a composer in choral music somewhat more grateful to the singers.

Evening Service in D. By Matthew Kingston.
[Birmingham: Rogers and Priestley.]

THIS is an extremely meritorious setting of the Magnificat and Nunc dimittis, being at once musically, pleasing, and unpretentious. Though some of the progressions, both of melody and harmony, have a modern flavour, the general style is church-like and refined. The service is within the means of parish choirs, and at the same time quite worthy of performance in a cathedral.

In Shadowland. Song. Poetry by Rea.
Don't forget me. Song. Written by Helen Marion Burnside. Composed by Ciro Pinsuti.
[Robert Cocks and Co.]

WE know not why these songs are sent to us for review, as for years they have been favourites; but it is never too late to say a word of praise upon really good music; and certainly to both the compositions we can accord unqualified commendation. The first one, "Shadowland," is somewhat gloomy; but drawing-room audiences like gloominess in vocal music, and this quality, therefore, will be no bar to the popularity of an attractive and thoroughly artistic song. "Don't forget me" is just one of those simple ballads which haunt the memory and make us believe in the eloquence of that style of writing of which our countryman, Balfe, produced so many excellent specimens, and which so few of his successors have continued. By the publication of any number of songs as good as the one before us, Signor Pinsuti need not fear that he will wear out his welcome.

Mon Bijou. Caprice pour Piano. Par Carl Bohm.
[Edwin Ashdown.]

So unpretentious and graceful a little sketch as "Mon Bijou" will be welcomed not only by listeners, but by teachers who are desirous that their pupils shall enjoy a little "light refreshment" after the more solid fare upon which they should be musically nourished. The principal theme is appropriately light and melodious, and the passages lie well under the fingers.

Two Andantes for the Organ. By Battison Haynes.
Op. 14.

[Leipzig: Kistner. London: Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THE high level of excellence reached in the previous organ works of Mr. Haynes is well sustained in these Andantes, which are well-developed movements, not mere trifles such as any ordinary player could improvise. The first, in D flat, is very German in character; and the second, in B flat, 3-8 time, is the more attractive and melodious of the two.

Sonatina, No. 2, in C. By Arthur B. Plant.

[Weekes and Co.]

THE author of this composition has been unduly modest in terming it a Sonatina, as it consists of three movements of fair dimensions. Of these the first is the most satisfactory, alike in subject-matter and treatment, being written in a broad and vigorous style without any excessive technical difficulties. The Andante con moto is pleasing, but the Fughetta is somewhat feeble as a finale.

FOREIGN NOTES.

THE Paris correspondent of the Times writes, under date the 20th ult. :—"The Opéra Comique, the theatre to which is chiefly confided the representation of works of the essentially French kind wherefrom the house takes its name, and which for that very reason is subsidised, reproduced yesterday with great success "Zampa," a comic opera by Hérold, played fifty-four years ago, and which reached its 554th representation. The interest of the performance lay in the rôle of Zampa, the pirate, played by the celebrated baritone Maurel. He performed the part in a very lively and original manner, and secured a real triumph in the air of the second act, "Il faut céder à mes lois," which he gave with the ability of a great musician and great actor. It is said that Cholet, who created this part in 1831, and who is now eighty-six years of age, was present in a baig-noire at this brilliant representation. There was another triumph for the orchestra, which Danbé conducted admirably, and which was applauded for ten minutes after the brilliant execution of the overture—one of the prettiest of the French school. The piece is very elegantly got up. The theatre was crowded by a select audience, and the revival was quite a success."

We also extract the following from a correspondence of the Daily Telegraph, dated January 21 :—"Great enthusiasm was displayed last night in the Salle Erard, where Herr Joachim gave the first of two private Concerts. The room was very well filled by all the most eminent professional and dilettante musicians in Paris, although very little previous notice had been given of the Concert, and the seats were 20 francs each. Such was the prodigious effect produced by Herr Joachim's playing that the audience were wild with delight. Seriously, I have never, in the experience of a quarter of a century, witnessed such enthusiasm at the playing of any soloist. . . . Herr Joachim is to play at the Châtelet next Sunday, and at his own Concert on the following evening." The programme of the Concert above referred to included Beethoven's Quartet in E minor, Schumann's Quartet in A major, and, amongst the solo pieces by the concert-giver, Bach's

"Chaconne," and a selection from Brahms's "Hungarian Dances."

M. Gounod is engaged upon the composition of an Oratorio entitled "Jeanne d'Arc," which is to be first produced in the Cathedral of Rheims.

On the occasion of the recent third repetition of M. Massenet's new opera "Le Cid," at the Paris Grand Opéra, the receipts amounted to 22,000 francs, the highest figure on record at that establishment.

The most conflicting rumours prevail in Continental journals concerning the already so much talked about new opera by Verdi. According to the information of some of our contemporaries, "Iago" is to be positively produced, during the present season, at the Paris Grand Opéra, while the journal Le Temps as positively asserts that the work has been preserved for La Scala, of Milan, to be brought out in the stagione of 1887. At the same time, we are informed, from another quarter, that the veteran Maestro has favoured some of his intimate friends with a sight of the complete score of the new work, adding that he should never allow it to be performed in public. Upon being asked the reason why, then, he had written it at all, Verdi is said to have replied, laconically, "Per mio diletto" (for my personal enjoyment). We would fain hope that the last quoted report, as far as the Maestro's dictum is concerned, will prove incorrect; but in the presence of so many divergent statements, we may well ask, in the words of Donna Anna, in Mozart's opera: A chi si credera?

The Italian Maestro Pietro Pinelli has been inspired to the composition of three Symphonies by the study of Dante's "Divina Commedia," and of Milton's "Paradise Lost." Under the collective title of "Dante and Milton," the works are to be shortly produced at Brescia.

Auber's graceful opera, "Fra Diavolo," written in 1830, appears to meet with a somewhat tardy recognition in Italy. At the Nicolini Theatre, of Florence, the work has lately been performed twenty times in succession, and continues to attract large audiences.

A correspondent writes to us from Rome :—"At an Invitation Concert of the German Club here on Saturday (16th ult.), when the performers were pupils of Liszt, the Abbé was prevailed upon to play a pianoforte solo, amidst tremendous enthusiasm. The Maestro was also present yesterday afternoon (18th ult.) at an Organ Recital given on the fine organ of the American Church. The programme consisted chiefly of compositions by Liszt, who expressed himself much pleased with the performance."

We hear from Florence of Signor Ciro Pinsuti's opera "Margherita" having been produced there for the first time at the Pergola Theatre, on the 16th ult., before a numerous audience. The work was very well received.

Mr. William Nicholl, a young English tenor, who gained the Parepa Rosa gold medal at the Royal Academy of Music in June last, and who is just now pursuing his studies under Signor Vannuccini, at Florence, gave a very successful first Concert in that town on the 12th ult. High praise is bestowed upon his performance in some of the local journals. Mr. Nicholl will, we understand, shortly return to this country.

An exhibition of antique musical instruments is shortly to be opened at the museum of Milan, and a series of Historical Concerts are to be given in connection therewith.

Signor Marchetti's new Opera, "Don Giovanni d'Austria," has met with brilliant success at the Teatro Costanzi, of Rome, the composer being called before the curtain no less than thirty times, and several numbers were redemanded.

The Carnival Season was inaugurated at leading Italian theatres with the following operatic works—viz., at the Apollo, of Rome, with "Aida"; at the Scala, of Milan, with "Carmen"; at the San Carlo, of Naples, with "Mefistofele"; at the Carlo Felice, of Genoa, with "Aida"; at the Regio, of Turin, with "La Juive"; at the Pergola, of Florence, with "Mignon"; at the Fenice, of Venice, with "Aida"; and at the Regio, of Parma, and the Politeama, of Palermo, with "Gioconda."

Twenty-eight new operas and operettas by native composers have been brought out in Italy during the year 1885.

WE hear from Munich of a most magnificent representation, given recently at the Hof-Theater, of Wagner's Tetralogy "Der Ring des Nibelungen." The Bavarian capital, it appears, is at present the only town in the Fatherland where the gigantic work has been placed permanently upon the operatic répertoire in its entirety.

The Royal Opera of Berlin brought out on New Year's Eve last, a German version of Poise's two act comic opera "La Surprise de l'amour" under the title of "Toni's Schatz." The public seems to have received this novelty with complete indifference, while the Berlin musical press considers the work to be a flimsy production, and wonders how the Intendant-General, Herr Von Hülsen, could have preferred it to several native masterpieces of comic opera which, like Peter Cornelius's "Barber of Bagdad," have never yet been presented to the audience of the leading operatic stage of the capital.

The newly founded Liszt Society of Leipzig announces a series of five vocal and instrumental Concerts to extend over the months of January to April, and for which a number of eminent artists have been engaged, assisted by the Académical Gesangverein "Arion." Notwithstanding the artistic importance of the undertaking, the subscription price for the series has been fixed as low as five marks, the Concerts being held at the Old Gewandhaus.

A highly successful performance is reported last month from Freiburg, of Franz Liszt's Oratorio "St. Elizabeth," under the able conductorship of music-director Dimmler.

The French standard diapason is about to be introduced in the orchestra of the Dresden Hof-Theater, where the tuning of instruments is in future to be regulated by an "electric whistle" in place of the oboe which hitherto performed that office, and which, we should imagine, somewhat resents its being thereby deprived of its leading part in the preliminary business of every performance.

A "Bach Society" has just been formed at Heidelberg, for the cultivation of standard choral works for the church, with especial regard to the compositions of the master whose name the Society bears. Bach's Cantata, "Ich hatte viel Bekümmerniss," and Beethoven's "Kleine Messe" were amongst the works chosen for immediate production. Herr Wolfram, the musical director of the Heidelberg University, is the Conductor.

A commemorative tablet is to be placed against the house, at Coblenz, in which Henriette Sontag, the once celebrated singer, first saw the light. Sontag, who was a favourite in London musical society some fifty years ago, died in Mexico in 1854.

Friedrich Schneider, the meritorious composer of oratorio, is to have a monument at his native town of Dessau, in commemoration of the centenary of his birth, which was celebrated on the 3rd ult.

A new Symphony (F major) by Eugen D'Albert, recently produced for the first time at Dresden, has met with much appreciation. The Dresdener Nachrichten concludes a eulogistic article on the subject with the remark:—"Great things may be looked for in the future from a composer whose early productions prove to be such decided hits." The new work is also to be performed at one of the Berlin Philharmonic Concerts, under direction of Herr Klindworth.

An interesting revival has taken place at the Hamburg Stadt-Theater in the performance of an Opera entitled "Die Franzosen vor Nizza," the libretto whereof was written by Richard Wagner for the composer, Franz Kittl, the whilom director of the Conservatoire at Prague, where the Opera was first performed with some success in 1848. The work is, however, said to be of but slight importance, and not likely to remain long in the répertoire of the Hamburg stage.

Herr Richard Strauss, of Munich, has been appointed successor of Dr. Hans von Bülow, in the conductorship of the famous Meiningen orchestra.

Carl Goldmark has just completed a five-act music-drama entitled "Merlin," which has been accepted for first performance at the Imperial Opera of Vienna.

Two members of the personnel of the Hamburg Stadt-Theater will take part in the forthcoming festival performances at Bayreuth—viz., Frau Rosa Sucher and Herr Heinrich Wiegand, both of whom will be favourably remembered by London amateurs, as having formed part of the excellent German company at Drury Lane, in 1882. Herr Wiegand has been engaged for the part of Gurnemanz in "Parsifal."

A "Salvum fac regem" from the pen of Herr Albert Becker, one of the most gifted of living German composers of sacred music, was performed at the Garrison-Kirche, of Berlin, in connection with the recent twenty-fifth anniversary of the Emperor's accession to the throne of Prussia.

The Beethoven prize of the Vienna Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde has been awarded this year to Herr Robert Fuchs for a Symphony.

Students of Goethe, and more especially the admirers of his world-famed novel, "The sufferings of young Werther," will derive some curious interest from the fact that a great grandson of the prototype of the heroine of that romance (Charlotte Buff), has just made his début, with conspicuous success, at the Dresden Hof-Theater, as a tenor singer. Herr Buff, whose nom de théâtre is Giessen, is said to have a brilliant career in store for him.

Wagner's "Götterdämmerung" is to be produced for the first time at the Dresden Hof-Theater in May next, and will be followed by a "cycle" of the poet-composer's recognised stage works, beginning with "Rienzi," and culminating in the complete representation of the "Nibelungen" Tetralogy. By this artistic deed the Hof-Theater will have effectually silenced all further reproach as to its indifference to the later productions of its former Capellmeister.

The first Concert Populaire of the new year at Brussels, on the 10th ult., was devoted exclusively to compositions by modern Russian composers. A Symphony by Borodine, a Miniature Suite by Cesar Cui, and a Servian Fantasia by Rimsky-Korsakoff were amongst the most successful numbers, the two first-named composers being present on the occasion.

Wagner's Opera, "The Flying Dutchman," was produced for the first time in December last, at the Teatro del Liceo, of Barcelona, and met with an enthusiastic reception, which has been confirmed by subsequent repetitions of the performance. The work was sung in Italian, with a French baritone, M. Devoyod, in the titre rôle. The same composer's "Tannhäuser" is now in course of preparation at the same theatre, which two years ago successfully produced "Lohengrin." The Liceo is one of the largest opera houses in the world.

Señor Pena y Goni, the Spanish musical savant, has just published a work entitled "La opera española y la musica dramática en España." The existing scarcity of similar works on musical subjects by Spanish writers, renders the above publication all the more interesting and important.

A new fortnightly journal was issued on January 1, at Paris, with the title of Revue d'art Dramatique, under the editorship of M. Edmond Stoulig.

A new Encyclopædia of Science, Art, and Literature, is shortly to be issued at Paris in twenty-five parts comprising 1,200 pages each. M. Arthur Pougin will contribute the articles relating to the Drama, and M. Henri Lavoix those concerning Music.

An interesting and highly characteristic portrait of Paganini, a faithful realisation, it is said, of the weird and fantastic outward appearance of the famous virtuoso, has just been published by Carl Simon, of Berlin. It is taken from an original drawing in the possession of the violinist, Herr Rudolph Perschky.

At Stuttgart died, on December 20, Max Seifritz, the musical director of the Hof-Theater, composer of numerous orchestral works, music to Schiller's "Jungfrau von Orleans," and choruses for male voices. He was born in 1827.

At Pesth died, on December 20, Carl Huber, professor at the Conservatorium of that town, and a composer of merit, aged fifty-seven.

The death is announced, at Paris, of Paul Baudry, the gifted painter and portraitist, whose artistic decorations of the foyer and other portions of the Paris Grand Opéra, entitle the event to a record in these columns.

The death is also announced, in Italy, of the Maestro Ponchielli, the most gifted of contemporary Italian composers after Verdi. For the particulars of his career, we refer our readers to our Obituary column.

CORRESPONDENCE.

"FAUST" AT THE LYCEUM.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—Your correspondent, in his article last month on "Faust at the Lyceum," writes of "the entire and absolute indifference of an English theatrical audience as to what music is played. In 'Faust' Mr. Irving has certainly deserved the thanks of musicians, though I fear he has earned something very unlike thanks from the bulk of his audience." * * * Entr'acte music is simply not listened to, so that the vulgarst of dance music, abominably played, is sufficient cover for conversation." The truth of these remarks must be fully admitted.

During a recent tour, in the capacity of conductor, I visited a large number of the principal provincial theatres, and was much struck with the general indifference of managers and public alike to the doings of the orchestra during the entr'acte.

That, however, it is possible for a manager to enlist the sympathy of the public to this not unimportant part of his programme, is more than proved nightly at the excellently conducted Theatre Royal, Edinburgh, and also at the Royal Princess's, Glasgow, both under the management of Mr. H. Cecil Beryl.

At these theatres respectively, Mr. Poyser and Herr Broussil direct performances of classical entr'acte music, and Scotch theatre-goers fully show their appreciation by close attention and hearty applause. Mr. Beryl takes a personal pride in his orchestras, and is to be congratulated on his success.

If Mr. Irving and other London managers continue to persevere in the same direction, the theatre will give a mighty impulse to the progress of orchestral music in this country.—Yours truly, 22, Maude Grove, S.W.

CHURCHILL SIBLEY.

CORDER'S "FAUST LEGEND."

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—Will you give me space in your esteemed columns for a few words in regard to Mr. F. Corder's article on "The Faust Legend, and its Musical Treatment by Composers," in your January issue? It contains so much valuable information, and is so eloquently written, that a theory, which is certainly questionable, might, I fear, under cover of the brilliant qualities of the writer, gain currency, if not combated. Mr. Corder is evidently not an unqualified admirer of Goethe's genius, and he belongs to the number of those who cannot sympathise with the second part of "Faust." He is of opinion that the second part "had better, perhaps, have never been written at all, at least as regards the unity of the work." German connoisseurs were for many years at variance in regard to its merits. The party Mr. Corder represents was headed by the celebrated F. T. Vischer, and by Kuno Fischer, and they condemned the second part unremittingly, the former even writing a satirical third part, under the characteristic nom-de-plume of Deutobold Symbolisiretti Allegorisiwitsch Mystifizinski. The opposition maintained that the whole of "Faust"—from the dedication, preceding the first part, to the chorus mysticus at the end of the second part—was worked on a grand fundamental plan, and that all excesses, such as the Walpurgis Night, or the scene in Auerbach's cellar, had a certain significance, and were of importance in the development of the whole, which would suffer if any part were removed. This opinion, with certain modifications, has spread widely of late, and the recent performances of the whole drama on most of the better German theatres—when, for the first time, it was possible to give a clear representation of the entire colossal poem—have made numerous proselytes on the other side. The first authorities on Goethe—Loeper, Düntzer, Ottingen, Schrouer, &c., have declared themselves for it, and Professor Schreyer has summed up the pros and cons of the vestibula questio in a volume on "Goethe's 'Faust,' als einheitliche Dichtung erläutere und verteidigt (Halle, 1881)," which makes believe that there can hardly be two opinions on the subject. It is shown that a great moral truth is taught in the whole of "Faust," while the first part by itself contains absolutely no moral at all. The Lord makes a wager with Mephistopheles, permitting him to tempt Faust, and to do with him whatever he likes, if he can disprove the Lord's word—

A good man, in his dim self-consciousness,
Is of the right road always well aware.

Youth, love, power, riches, the craving of his age—(time of the renaissance)—the beau-ideal of antiquity are the baits held forth by Mephistopheles to the insatiable Faust. But nothing Mephistopheles can provide gives Faust real happiness, which he at last finds in devoting his best energies to advance the welfare of his fellow-creatures, and in leading a life of useful toil. Mephistopheles has lost his wager, and Faust's soul is carried to heaven by angels.

It is, perhaps, the only actual fault in that wonderful production at the Lyceum Theatre—if it is not ungenerous to find fault, where almost everything is admirable—that the ending is not in harmony with Goethe's plan. But as Mr. Irving in his first night speech promised to do all in his power to make his production, by degrees, resemble the original more and more, it is to be hoped that this important point will not escape his notice. If, as I do not even venture to hope, he should ever crown his first great effort by a still greater one and produce the second part of "Faust" before an English audience, I think Mr. Corder and most of those who will not now admit the unity of "Faust" would then be compelled to allow that, contradictory and paradox as the different parts may appear, they still all help to make up a very harmonious whole.

It may be worth while mentioning one small inaccuracy in Mr. Corder's paper. "The first part," he says, "completed in 1797, Goethe re-wrote the whole," &c. The first part was not completed till 1806, only a "fragment"—as it is styled on the title-page—having previously appeared, in 1790.

With apologies for the length to which my letter has inadvertently grown,

I am, Sir, your obedient Servant,

January 9, 1886.

WM. HEINEMANN.

[I have remarked before that one can never let fly an assertion but it is sure to break a window somewhere. A feuilletonist in the Globe happened once in a sprightly article to speak disparagingly of the multiplication table. He was instantly deluged with letters accusing him of denying that twice two made four. While thanking Herr Heinemann for his courteous letter, I must beg leave to point out that my article deals with its lofty subject from an irreverent and matter-of-fact point of view, being intended, not as a grave philosophical criticism, but as a simple prosaic account, written for the general reader.—F. C.]

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—It may interest some of your readers to know that a reprint of the English translation of the old "Faust" story, referred to by Mr. Corder in his interesting article on the subject in the current number of THE MUSICAL TIMES, was published just over a year ago by Messrs. Routledge, in a small volume of "Medieval Tales," edited by Professor Henry Morley. Mr. Corder mentions its having appeared in Thorn's "Early English Prose Romances," but the last edition of that book was issued (according to Professor Morley) as far back as 1858.—Faithfully yours,

LEONARD G. WINTER.

CONCERT-GOERS AND CONCERT-GIVERS.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—The article in your current number which has arisen out of the correspondence between Mr. Manns and "Subscriber," opens up a wide question—the composition of concert programmes. With your permission I will offer a few remarks thereon.

But first let me say I cannot bring myself to feel much sympathy for "Subscriber." Granting that the facts of her letter were true—which Mr. Manns has shown is not the case—the thoughtless and intemperate tone of her communication very naturally led Mr. Manns to assume that he had to deal with an ignoramus. Small wonder then if he regarded her interference as an unwarrantable presumption; and, while taking care to effectually dispose of the grounds of her complaint, proceeded in a satirical vein to show that he is not to be looked upon as a fit butt for the shafts of anonymous scribblers. Where is the "breaking of the butterfly on the wheel" in this?

In all that relates in your article to the repetition of new works, I heartily concur. To repeat a new musical composition at a near date after its first performance is, I hold, for the reasons you have given, very desirable. Why it is that conductors generally are guided by a contrary practice, is not easy to understand. It would have been thought that the favourable reception of a new symphony would have insured its speedy repetition by one or other of our concert-giving societies, if not by that which originally presented it. But is this the case? Do we not all know that the exact opposite is the rule? Cannot every observant concert-goer name several works which, in spite of having afforded the liveliest satisfaction on their first appearance, have been for no palpable reason shelved for an indefinite period? Let me give a few instances: (Five years ago Mr. F. H. Cowen produced his own "Scandinavian" Symphony. How many persons—unless they have been abroad to do so—have heard it since? Ab hoc uno desce omnes. Goetz's Symphony in F, Dvorák's in D, Cowen's "Welsh" (the Symphony which gave rise to this discussion); Raff's "Im Walde," not to mention others, have each a like history. Heard once to be admired and applauded, they have for some inscrutable reason—or the want of it, somewhere—been put aside and forgotten by our conductors. True, some of these have recently figured at the Promenade Concerts. But the Promenade Concerts are scarcely taken seriously by musicians, and conductors cannot therefore excuse their own remissness by referring us to them. Nevertheless, some of us would have fared but meagrely had it not been for the classical nights at Covent Garden.

It was hardly a happy thought to quote the course pursued at the Richter Concerts in support of the question under consideration. Here repetitions have been so much the custom that the bulk of the compositions performed are in imminent danger of becoming hackneyed. It is not merely that the principal items of the programmes have been, and to a large extent still are, confined to the compositions of two or three writers. That would be bad enough, were their works ever so numerous. But in this case the principle of selection has actually necessitated ringing the changes on some two or three dozen only. This number may be reduced to still more ridiculous proportions if it is remembered that many of the Wagner pieces are merely "excerpts" and "arrangements" having, strictly speaking, no right in the concert-room at all. No doubt propagandist arguments may be put forward for repeating the latter, but these, I submit, do not apply to Beethoven. To repeat the Choral Symphony frequently is undoubtedly very well, for until the advent of Herr Richter it was a rara avis at London concerts. But this cannot be said of Beethoven's Symphonies in C minor and A major. There are probably no two works of their class more familiar. Therefore, I ask, is there any adequate cause why these should be so constantly given, seeing that this involves the exclusion of other worthy examples of the symphony—aye, even of their famous fellows.

In conclusion, I would urge that it is distinctly to the advantage of the concert-giver to offer to the concert-goer more than a single opportunity of hearing any new work of importance. At the same time, I cannot too strongly protest against any system of framing programmes which gives colour to the mischievously narrow idea that, because we have found the compositions of Beethoven and Wagner good and to our liking, those of the other masters of musical art are of little or no account. Who will say that there is not now-a-days a tendency to take some such restricted view?—I am, Sir, your obedient Servant,

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—I have often wondered why in an age of musical enterprise like this, when so many cheap editions are being issued of the best musical classics, so little has been done for madrigals. Of the three great madrigalian schools—Italian, Flemish, and English—we possess only a very few specimens of the first two, while even of our native school we can boast but some thirty or forty! It seems to me this is a time when we may with advantage make ourselves acquainted with more of the masterpieces of such men as Luca Marenzio, Wilbye, Arkadelt, Vecchi, Bateson, Weekes, and many others. Marenzio alone composed a vast number of beautiful madrigals, scarcely a dozen of which are to be had in a cheap form (mostly published by Novello). Out of 286 of his, of which I possess the titles, nearly sixty are adapted to English words already—some in the old collections published by Yonge and Watson almost 300 years ago, others from Professor Taylor's "Vocal Schools of Italy" and from Mr. Oliphant's Collection—and many of these would be a welcome addition to our present store, as "Farewell, cruel and unkind" and "Fair Shepherd's Queen" (both S.A.T.B.), and "Queen of the World" (S.S.A.T.B.); also Vecchi's exquisite conception, "The white delightsome Swan" (S.S.A.T.B.), Gastoldi's "Soon as the silver moonbeams" (S.S.A.T.B.), and Spontone's "The joyous Birds" (S.A.T.B.). As regards Constanza Festa, it is simply wonderful that a people who so enthusiastically admire "Down in a flow'ry vale" should not seek to make acquaintance with more of his productions. I may state that Dr. Burney, the historian, admired Festa so much that he took the trouble of transcribing an entire book of them, which is now to be seen in the British Museum. We are rather better supplied with the madrigals of our own composers; but even there I can mention a number of gems not yet accessible in a cheap form. Wilbye's "Down in a valley as Alexis trips," and its sequel, "Die, hapless man," and "Why dost thou shoot?"; Weekes's "When Thoralis delights to walk," "Lady, the birds right fairly," "We shepherds sing," and "Ha! ha! ha! this world doth pass"; Bateson's "Sister, awake!" "Have I found her?" and "Who prostrate lie"; Dowland's "Go, crystal tears"; Morley's "Lo! I come with flow'ry head"; Ward's "Upon a bank"; and Pilkington's "Now peep, bo-peep"; also, coming to later times, "Wesley's fine madrigal," "O, syngye unto my roundelae," and several of the late Sir John L. Rogers' beautiful pieces. I need not say it would be easy to add many more to the small list given above, which is merely a suggestion of what might be done. Hoping that ere long that suggestion may be acted upon,

I remain, yours, &c.,

D. BAPTIE.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

. Notices of concerts, and other information supplied by our friends in the country, must be forwarded as early as possible after the occurrence; otherwise they cannot be inserted. Our correspondents must specifically denote the date of each concert, for without such date no notice can be taken of the performance.

Our correspondents will oblige by writing all names as clearly as possible, as we cannot be responsible for any mistakes that may occur.

Correspondents are informed that their names and addresses must accompany all communications.

We cannot undertake to return offered contributions; the authors, therefore, will do well to retain copies.

Notice is sent to all Subscribers whose payment (in advance) is exhausted. The paper will be discontinued where the Subscription is not renewed. We again remind those who are disappointed in obtaining back numbers that, although the music is always kept in stock, only a sufficient quantity of the rest of the paper is printed to supply the current sale.

BRIEF SUMMARY OF COUNTRY NEWS.

We do not hold ourselves responsible for any opinions expressed in this Summary, as all the notices are either collated from the local papers or supplied to us by correspondents.

ABERFELDY, N.B.—On Christmas Day an Organ Recital was given in St. David's Episcopal Church, Ween, by Mr. Jesse Timson, Organist and Choirmaster to Sir Robert Menzies, Bart. The programme included Hallelujah Chorus (Handel and Beethoven), Festive March (Smart), Andante in E minor (Battiste), &c. The choir sang a number of carols effectively, and the services throughout the day were well rendered.—A Concert was given by the members of the Choral Union on the 15th ult., the programme consisting of selections from the Oratorios of Handel, Beethoven, and Mendelssohn, and part-songs, which were well rendered. Mr. Dan Wylie, of Perth, was an efficient accompanist, and Mr. Jesse Timson conducted.

ALFORD.—The Choral Society gave a performance of The Rose Maiden on the 18th ult. The work was ably rendered, under the con-

Directorship of Mr. Henry Brown. The solos were effectively sung by Miss Vinnie Beaumont, Miss Eliza Thomas, Mr. Dunkerton, and Mr. E. Jackson. Dr. Dodds presided at the pianoforte.

BAKKEWELL.—The Choral Society's first Concert of the season was given in the Town Hall on Tuesday, December 22, when Barnby's Rebekah, and a miscellaneous selection of music, were performed. The principal vocalists were Miss F. Brunner, Mr. Kendall Thompson, and Mr. G. Terry; pianoforte, Master Westbrook; Conductor, Mr. B. B. Mellor. The choruses were accompanied by an efficient band.

BARNBY.—A very successful Concert was given at the Town Hall on the 7th ult., under the direction of Mr. Ernest A. Williams. The vocalists were Madame Clara West, Miss Pattie Michie, Messrs. Jno. Cross, E. A. Williams, A. G. Pritchard, and W. Abbott (violin.) The hall was crowded.

BARROW-IN-FURNESS.—A performance of Handel's Messiah was given in the Town Hall, on Christmas Day, before a large audience. The principal soloists were Madame Farrar Hyde, R.A.M., Miss Maud Yates, Mr. Payne Clarke, and Mr. J. Malby. The band and chorus numbered about eighty performers. The choruses were given with great precision throughout, under the conductorship of Mr. S. Thornborough.

BLACKBURN.—The members of the Vocal Society, under the conductorship of Mr. W. H. Robinson, gave the first Concert of their eleventh season on the 13th ult. Lloyd's Song of Balder and Birch's Merrie Men of Sherwood Forest formed the principal portion of the programme, which included part-songs, orchestral pieces, and the Jewel Song from Faust, admirably sung by Miss Albu, who also sustained the soprano parts in the Cantatas. The choruses were given with great precision and due observance of light and shade, a result with the careful direction of the Conductor. The orchestra was composed of members of Mr. Charles Hallé's and Mr. De Jong's bands.

BOLTON.—On the 9th ult., the last of a series of Chamber Concerts was given in the Hall of the Mechanics' Institution, with Signor Risegari and M. Vieuxtemps as principal instrumentalists. The Concert was first-class in character, but owing to the unfavourable weather the attendance was not large. On the evening of the same day another popular Concert was promoted by Mr. A. E. Moore, and on the 16th the third of a series of Concerts for the People, furthered by the Local Committee, proved a great success; the vocalists were Miss Hoyle and Mr. H. Taylor, and the music was supplied by the Bolton Orchestral Society.

BURNLEY.—St. Paul was performed on the 11th ult., in the Mechanics' Institute, by Mr. E. S. Massey's Choir of eighty voices; solo vocalists—Miss Thudichum, Miss Horner, Mr. Seymour Jackson, and Mr. Robert Hilton. The band was composed of members of Mr. Hallé's and Mr. De Jong's orchestras; Leader, Herr Otto Bernhard; Organist, Mr. J. G. Galt; Conductor, Mr. E. S. Massey. The choruses acquitted themselves in their usual artistic manner, and the choruses were executed with great taste and precision throughout, reflecting the highest credit on the Conductor. Gounod's Redemption is to be performed by Mr. Massey's Choir on Easter Monday.

CARDIFF.—The members of the Musical Association gave their fifth annual Concert, on the 6th ult., at the Park Hall. The works performed were Haydn's Oratorio the Creation, and Mendelssohn's Athalie, both of which were excellently rendered. The vocalists were Miss Anna Williams, Miss Emily Davies, Mr. Henry Piercy, and Mr. W. Kinniburgh. The choruses were augmented by members of the Hereford and Llandaff Cathedral choirs, and there was a fine band, led by Mr. Alfred Burnett. Mr. Walter Scott conducted. The Concert was a great success.

CHELSEHAM.—An Entertainment was given to the members of the choir of St. Stephen's Church, on Tuesday evening, December 29, at the Tivoli Institute, by Mrs. and Miss Gillian. The Rev. W. Gordon Baillie, curate in charge, and Mr. J. O. Smith, Organist of the Church, presided. In the course of the evening the Rev. W. Baillie, in a name of the choir boys, presented Miss Cecilia C. F. Smith with a handsome floral photographic album, as a small acknowledgment of her kindness to them. Miss Smith thanked the boys in a graceful speech.

CHESTERFIELD.—The Choral Society gave a performance of the Creation, on December 30. Mr. Biegin conducted, and the principal vocalists were Miss Vinnie Beaumont, Mr. J. Lancaster, Mr. E. Slack, and Mr. T. Kempton. The Oratorio was in every respect most efficiently rendered.

CHESTER-LE-STREET.—Handel's Judas Maccabees was given with full orchestral accompaniments in the Wesleyan Chapel on Monday, the 11th ult., by the Houghton-le-Spring Choral Society, to a large and appreciative audience. The solo vocalists were Miss Farrow and Mrs. Proom, Mr. D. Whitehead, and Mr. R. Grice. Mr. Ferry led the band, Miss Leonard presided at the organ, and Mr. J. G. Craggs conducted.

CORK.—A Recital of selections from Verdi's Opera Il Trovatore, with a fine orchestra and choir, was given at the Assembly Rooms, South Mall, on the 12th ult., with much success. Miss Lucy Ashton Hackett, Mrs. Jerome Murphy, Mrs. W. H. Lyons, Messrs. J. O'Mara, M. Ambrose, M. Mescali, G. Waters, and J. Sullivan sustained the principal parts with much effect, and their efforts were warmly and deservedly applauded. The leader of the band was Mr. R. Howard, and Herr Gmür, who had trained his choir to a high state of efficiency, conducted. The hall was crowded in every part, and numbers of persons were unable to obtain admission.

CROYDON.—A Concert was given on the 13th ult., at the Elmwood Hall, by the Philharmonic Society, conducted by Mr. H. L. Balfour. The programme comprised Bennett's Woman of Samaria, and a miscellaneous programme, with a selection from Mendelssohn's Lorelei. The soloists were Misses Bessie Diamond, Emily Dones, Messrs. Alfred Kenningham and T. Kempton. The music was exceedingly well rendered, Mr. Balfour having trained his choir with much skill and judgment. There was a large attendance.

DENERBARRA.—The fifth Concert of the Musical Society, under the conductorship of Mr. W. R. Colbeck, was given on Tuesday, December 29, at the Philharmonic Hall, under the patronage of His Excellency the Governor and Lady Irving. The programme consisted of Lloyd's Cantata, Hero and Leander, and a miscellaneous selection. The solos in the Cantata were well rendered by Mrs. H. L. Wight and Major Chermiside. In the second part songs were charmingly sung by Mrs. Wieting, and Mr. Hemery contributed a violoncello solo.

DINGWALL, N.B.—A very successful Amateur Concert was given on Friday evening, the 15th ult., in aid of the funds of the Musical Association. Sir Kenneth S. Mackenzie, Bart., occupied the chair. The feature of the evening was the violin playing of Mr. Davis (Beaulieu), accompanied on the pianoforte by Mrs. Mackenzie, of Ord. The solo pianists were Miss V. Munro-Ferguson and Miss Ross. Songs were contributed by Miss I. Fraser and Mr. Fielding. Miss Nellie Munro was a most efficient accompanist.

DUNSTABLE.—On Tuesday, the 12th ult., Mr. Fred. Gostelow, R.A.M., gave his second annual Concert in the Town Hall, which was crowded to excess. The principal vocalists were Miss Minnie Kirten, Mr. John Cross, and Mrs. Drifill. The programme included Haydn's "Toy" Symphony, and Grouse's "Fairie Voices," both pieces being accorded Mr. Gostelow played the Allegro vivace from Mendelssohn's Pianoforte Concerto in G minor (the orchestral parts being performed by Mr. A. D. Farmer on a large two-manual and pedal American organ), and Mattei's Grand Valse de Concert, the latter receiving an enthusiastic encore.

DUNSTER.—A Concert was given on the 9th ult., at the Assembly Rooms, by Mr. Warriner's Choir, when Rossini's Stabat Mater, and a miscellaneous selection were performed. The soprano and contralto solos were artistically rendered by Miss Fusselle, L.R.A.M., and Miss Eliza Thomas, R.A.M. (Medalist), the tenor and bass solos being taken by members of the choir. The choruses were most effectively sung, and a small, but efficient orchestra, led by Mr. O. T. Sadler, rendered good service. The organist was Mr. Fred. Winkley, A.C.O., and Mr. Warriner conducted. On the 13th ult., Mr. Warriner, L.Mus., &c., gave an Organ Recital at the Assembly Rooms before a large audience.

EASINGTON LANE.—The Choral Society gave a performance of Handel's Oratorio Samson, on New Year's Day, to a crowded audience. The principal vocalists were Miss Foster, Miss Belles, Mr. D. Whitehead, and Mr. Grice, of Durham Cathedral; leader of the band, Mr. Bousfield; organist, Mr. Perry; Conductor, Mr. S. Platts.

Fiji.—On Friday, October 30, The Messiah was performed for the first time in Polynesia, at the Presbyterian Church at Suva, the capital of the Fiji Islands, in the presence of the Hon. the Administrator and Mrs. Thurston, and of a representative audience of 155 persons. The accompaniments on the organ were ably given by Mr. White, formerly a pupil of Mr. W. Warwick Jordan, and the whole affair was arranged and directed by the Conductor, Mr. Wilfred Collet. The solos were taken by Mrs. Berry, Miss Moore, and Miss Robertson (soprano), Mrs. Collet and Mrs. Sturt (contralto), Mr. Forth and Mr. Stevenson (tenors), and Mr. Irvine (basso). Considering the double duty of officiating alike as soli and as chorus, the achievement of the performers was beyond anything which could have been expected, and the utmost credit is due to all.

FRODSHAM, CHESHIRE.—A very successful Concert was given in the Town Hall, on Monday, the 11th ult., for the benefit of the Bible Class Bazaar. The solo vocalists were Miss Bairstow, L.C.M., Miss Johnson, Mr. Morrison, and Mr. O'Connor; pianoforte, Miss Benbow and Mr. Lamb. Miss Bairstow was very successful in the "Angels' Serenade" (violin obbligato by Mr. Lamb), "Kathleen Mavourneen," and "Rule Britannia" (the audience joining in the chorus of the latter song), and Miss Johnson was much applauded for her singing of "Auntie," "Pierrot," and the duet in the dusk of the twilight" (in which she was joined by Miss Bairstow). Mr. Morrison gave "The angel at the window" and "Didst thou but know" in excellent style, being vociferously encored for the latter. Miss Benbow gave an admirable rendering of "English airs" (Sivrai) and Gottschalk's "Pasquinade." A feature of the evening was a Medley for piano, bells, and musical glasses, arranged by Mr. Lamb. This piece, artistically played by Mr. Lamb on the above instruments, and ably accompanied on the piano by Miss Benbow, so pleased the audience that an encore was irresistible. A word of praise is due to Mr. O'Connor for his humorous songs, all of which were encored. The Concert was brought to a close by the singing of the National Anthem.

GUILDFORD.—Mr. Ernest A. Williams gave his popular Musical and Dramatic Recital on the 20th ult. The programme included some of Messrs. Gilbert and Sullivan's popular songs. Mr. Williams was assisted by Miss Emily and Mr. A. G. Pritchard.

HALIFAX.—Mr. J. H. Sykes gave his third Concert of the series at the Albany Music Rooms, on the 12th ult., assisted by Miss Mary Waite, vocalist; Miss Nellie Marshall, pianoforte, and Mr. C. Fawcett, clarinet. Mr. Owen Blinn accompanied. The programme, which was miscellaneous, was well rendered.

HANLEY.—The Hanley and Shelton Philharmonic Society gave its annual performance of The Messiah on the 7th ult., in the Imperial Hall. Principal soloists—Miss Clara Samuelli, Miss Hope Glenn, Mr. Ben Davies, and Mr. Vaughan Edwards. The choruses were exceedingly well rendered under the baton of Mr. F. Mountford. The soloists were in good voice, Mr. Edwards receiving much applause for his singing of the bass music. Mr. Ward led the band, and Mr. Sourbuts played the solo trumpet. The hall was crowded.

HARPENDEN.—The Choral Society gave its first Concert of the season on Wednesday, the 20th ult., under the conductorship of Mr. W. H. Anscombe. In the first part The Pilgrim's Progress, by Edmund Rogers, was performed; and in the second, vocal and instrumental selections from Samson, The Messiah, Israel in Egypt, and the Stabat Mater chiefly made up the programme. The Society had excellent assistance from the Messrs. Burditt and R. Longland; Messrs. W. Rose, F. Hilbert, White, F. A. Batchelor, and G. Rose.

SOUTH SHIELDS.—The members of the Church Institute Choral Society gave their Annual Concert in the Free Library Hall, on Monday, the 4th ult., assisted by Madame Shepherd, Messrs. D. Whitehead, and Nutton; Conductor, Mr. J. Carr. The Hall was crowded to excess.

SPALDING.—Mr. Price, Organist of the Parish Church, gave his benefit Concert on the 13th ult., Mr. Dunkerton, of Lincoln Cathedral, being the principal vocalist. Mr. James Price, brother to the Sinfonista, played Chopin's Nocturne in E flat and Polonaise in A flat, Liszt's brilliant of his own composition, and, in the second part, Beethoven's "Moonlight" Sonata.

STAVELEY.—On Tuesday evening, the 5th ult., the members of the Church of England Working Men's Society gave their annual Concert in the school room, before a large and appreciative audience. The principal vocalists were Madame Daglish, Miss Fannie Lynn, R.A.M., and Mr. Bingley Shaw. Mr. Norman Hibbert (Peterborough Cathedral) was solo pianist and Conductor. The Misses Fisher and Miss Cooper also gave pianoforte solos. The Concert was in every respect a decided success.

TENBY.—The Choral Society gave its first Concert of the season on the 11th ult. The programme comprised Bennett's May Queen and a well-selected selection. The vocalists were Miss Morris, Miss Fearon, Mr. J. Morgan, and Mr. J. R. Rowlands; and the accompanists, Miss Hall (piano) and Mr. Hancock (harmonium). Mr. W. Terence Jenkins conducted.

THORNBURY, GLOUCESTERSHIRE.—By invitation of Mr. Stafford and Lady Rachel Howard, an excellent Concert was given at Thornbury Castle on the 19th ult. The programme included part-songs by a chorus of amateurs, conducted by Mr. Albert New, of Clifton, and instrumental solos on the Arion-Zither and Philomela, by Herr Curt Schulz (Zitherist to H.R.H. the Princess of Wales), and the Hungarian Cimbál and Xylophone by Madame Schulz. The vocal solos were given by Miss Winthrop, who was warmly and deservedly applauded. The Concert opened with a part-song by Hutton, followed by a solo on the Philomela by Herr Schulz. This instrument is, we believe, but little known, but in the skilful hands of Herr Schulz was most effective, especially in Raff's beautiful "Cavatina"; but perhaps it was the solos on the Zither that he achieved his greatest success, and elicited enthusiastic encores. The solos for the Cimbál and the duets for Zither and Xylophone exhibited on the part of Madame Schulz a truly marvellous technique.

TRURO.—Mr. Charles Fowler, who has for so many years held a prominent place amongst musicians of the West, gave two Concerts at the Bath Saloon, on the 4th ult., previous to his departure for London, where he has been appointed a Professor of the Pianoforte at the Royal Academy of Music. The programme included a Sonata (Op. 8) for violin and pianoforte, by Grieg, Beethoven's Sonata in G (Op. 30, No. 3), for the same instruments, and the last two movements of Mr. Fowler's Sonata for voice, violin, and pianoforte, the vocal part of which was charmingly sung by Mrs. Wright. Mr. Fowler's rendering of his own "Rondo Prestissimo" was a feature in the Concert, and his pupil's (Mr. Charles Edwards) performance of two pieces by Sterndale Bennett elicited warm and well-deserved applause. Other features in the programme deserving of mention were the violin playing of Miss Adeline Dinelli, and the singing of Mr. Bovett.

WALSALL.—On Saturday evening, December 26, a performance of Handel took place in the Temperance Hall under the auspices of the Gospel Temperance Union. The band and chorus consisted of 150 performers; Miss Miner, Miss Neal, Mr. Breeze, and Mr. Snape being the solo vocalists. Mr. F. Mason presided at the harmonium, and Mr. Rogers, A.M.S., T.C.L., conducted. There was an immense audience, hundreds being turned away for want of room. The performance was of a great success.

WALTHAMSTOW.—On Wednesday evening, December 30, the choir of Trinity Congregational Church, augmented for the occasion, gave its annual performance of Handel's Messiah. Mr. E. S. Goodes, the leader of the church choir, conducted. The choir was well balanced, and the choruses were rendered with great precision. Mr. Fountain Meen presided at the organ. The soloists were Miss Kate Fusselle, Miss Annie Williams, Mr. John Probert, and Mr. Frank May, R.A.M., all of whom were thoroughly efficient.

WEYMOUTH.—A very successful Concert, organised by the Town Society, was given on the 19th ult., at the Royal Hotel Assembly Room. The artists were Miss Bliss, vocalist; Herr Peiniger, violinist; and Mr. Charles Hopkins Udd, pianist. A well-selected programme was excellently rendered, the artists receiving the warmest applause. There was a large and appreciative audience.

WILTON.—The Musical Society gave its second Concert in the Town Hall on the 21st ult. Mr. S. Miner's talents, The Daughter of Jarius, and a selection from Handel, formed the first part of the programme, and in the second part several solos, part-songs, and instrumental selections, were very successfully given. The soloists were Miss Pottow, Miss Pretty, Miss Moore, and Messrs. Breezer and Snook. Mr. J. M. Hayden, of Salisbury, the Conductor of the Society, also sang with much success. Miss Eyres, Miss Brazier, and Mr. Holt shared the accompaniments at the pianoforte and organ.

WIRKSWORTH.—Mr. E. Birch gave his annual Concert, before a crowded audience, in the Town Hall on Tuesday, December 29. The principal vocalist were Madame Clara Gardner, Miss F. Birch, Miss Hatchett, Mr. Ernest Marriott (Manchester Cathedral), and Mr. Bingley Shaw (Southwell Cathedral); solo pianoforte, Miss Walker; accompanist, Miss G. M. Birch. Mr. Birch was unable, through indisposition, to take part in the Concert.

WORKINGTON.—An Organ Recital was given at St. John's Church, on December 30, by Mr. J. F. Scurr, Organist of the Church. The programme was well selected, and excellently rendered. There was a large and appreciative congregation. After the Recital a Concert took place in the Parish Room, the vocalists being Miss White, R.A.M., and Mrs. Macarthur.

ORGAN APPOINTMENTS.—Mr. R. T. Gibbons, F.C.O., to West Hackney Parish Church.—Mr. Henry Smith, Organist and Choirmaster to Holy Trinity, Guildford.—Mr. Henry Kitchingman, Organist and Choirmaster to the Parish Church, Rochdale.—Mr. Alfred E. Icard, Organist and Choirmaster to St. Mary's Parish Church, Lambeth.—Mr. Lewis E. Bearse, Organist and Choirmaster to Newton College, South Devon.—Mr. Wm. PASSION SERVICE

NEW SACRED WORK

FOR THE SEASON OF

LENT AND GOOD FRIDAY,

BY

ALFRED R. GAUL,

COMPOSER OF THE "HOLY CITY," "RUTH," &c.

SHEFFIELD INDEPENDENT.

"Scholarly writing, combined with unmistakable talent, and eminently adapted to the purpose for which it was written and composed, the work will probably be largely used, and Mr. Gaul have to be congratulated upon another success."

MUSICAL STANDARD.

"In this fresh musical product Mr. Gaul has the advantage of an open field, till very recently closed almost entirely to the Anglican Church composer; so that at the outset his work claims the merit of distinctiveness. The text of Mr. Gaul's work is good and elaborate in structure, it is the compilation of the Rev. J. C. Blissard, author at the same time of the original lyrical portions of the work. The course of sacred events connected with the Passion is laid out by the writer so as to form a series of six distinct 'scenes,' the literary construction of these being similar in plan throughout, but each preserving its own separate unity and point of narrative or dramatic interest. The subjects of these divisions, each occupied with a particular stage of the Mystery, are, respectively: 'The traitor at the table,' 'The Denial,' 'The Condemnation before Pilate,' 'The Mockery on Calvary,' 'The Shadow of Death,' and 'The Holy Sepulchre.' Each comprises a prophetic portion (the words selected from those passages of Holy Writ 'foreshadowing' the event), and preceded by a short choral, which is retained unaltered throughout the work; a narrative portion dealing with the especial event and what may be termed the lyrical epode, a hymn embodying the subjective reflection on the preceding passages, and in which the whole congregation is supposed to take part. The author has executed the compilation and versification with commendable judgment and skill. As regards the composer's share in the work, it must be noted, in the first place, that whilst endeavouring to illustrate in the best manner possible the outward course of the events, the dramatic element, properly so called, has been carefully kept out of the work. Individual characterisation has been avoided by allotting the different solo musical passages without regard to any representative character. This arrangement has no doubt been prompted by judicious reasons, and there is much to be urged in its favour. Mr. Gaul has adopted the arioso style of musical setting for the solo portions of his work. In certain parts, as in the melodious aria form, but in general the more declamatory style is preserved. There is no imitation of archaic forms in either melodies or harmony, and in the descriptive episodes the composer has not been tempted into theatrical exaggeration in order to secure dramatic effect. The style of the composition, in short, resembles generally that of Mr. Gaul's previous writings—the same effective, grateful part-writing, and the same expressive and melodious treatment of the solo voice. In those sections, notably that of the Unjust Condemnation, where the realistic element is predominant, the composer has manifested his ability to write with dramatic force and intensity as well as with lyric charm. In this respect the choral writing distinguished itself in comparison with that in the 'Holy City' and other of the composer's works. Among the items which impressed us most favourably was the chorus 'The flinty pot is for silver,' the beautiful choral passage 'Watch and pray,' the whole of the choral passages of the Condemnation scene (the original treatment of this scene evades any comparison with the part of the Passion music of other writers); the contralto aria 'Oh, he ye this, all ye people,' the fine chorus 'Consider this,' the culminating point of the scene on Calvary; the trio for soprano, tenor, and bass 'Thou hidest Thy face, O Lord'; the quartet 'Hath God forgotten to be gracious'; the strikingly effective chorus 'God is not a man that He should lie'; the solo before mentioned, 'Blessed are the departed,' with its choral appendage (solo quartet); and last, but not least in merit, the fine setting of Adelaide Procter's lines 'Why should'st thou fear the beautiful angel Death,' full like the poem of a sweet, subdued, delicious calm. Mr. Gaul has not written new hymn-tunes for Mr. Blissard's lyrics; the tunes selected for this occasion were from among those in ordinary congregational use. Altogether considered, Mr. Gaul's new work will undoubtedly greatly enhance his already high reputation in the line of sacred composition. An overflowing congregation testified to the great interest taken in the work on Saturday evening the work was repeated, the attendance being almost equally large with that of the previous evening."

BIRMINGHAM DAILY MAIL.

"A second experience simply confirms the remark hazarded on the first presentation—viz., that the work is not only the most important Mr. Gaul has yet given to the world of art, but is one that, when familiar, must arrest attention."

Price, paper cover, 2s. 6d.; paper boards, 3s.; scarlet cloth, 4s.

Words by EDWARD OXENFORD

MUSIC BY

ALFRED R. GAUL

(Composer of the "Holy City," "Ruth," &c.)

"There are in this series of duets the sweetest things of the kind we have ever met with. No. 4, 'April,' and No. 5, 'May,' are our special favourites, the one being delightfully playful, the other tenderly melodious. Things to be treasured in households where sisters or friends delight in joining voices. The pianoforte accompaniments are well written, and such as an ordinary pianist may successfully undertake."—Birmingham Daily Gazette.

VOICE-TRAINING EXERCISES

(FOR SOPRANO, MEZZO-SOPRANO, CONTRALTO, BARITONE, & BASS VOICES)

BY

EMIL BEHNKE

AND

CHARLES W. PEARCE.

Price Eighteenpence each. In Cloth Boards, Three Shillings each.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS, &c.

"I am much obliged to you for sending me your Voice Exercises. They seem to me admirable, and doubtless will prove of great utility.

"FREDERICK A. G. OUSELEY."

"I like the Vocal Exercises very much; they are scientific, systematic, and ingenious.

"JOHN STAINER."

"This is a novel work, both in plan and detail, and the combined labours of a well-known scientific lecturer on the voice and an excellent musician have brought the undertaking to a successful issue. . . . These very complete and satisfactory training exercises are printed in six different books for the same number of voices, thus: soprano, mezzo-soprano, contralto, tenor, baritone, and bass. The work may be safely and cordially recommended to vocal students and even to practised singers, quite apart from any grounds of discussion concerning methods of teaching."—Musical Standard.

"The exercises are, with great skill, arranged so as to give a maximum of benefit with a minimum of fatigue. They are melodious and natural, and are consequently pleasant of performance. The accompanying pianoforte part is helpful without being either distracting or unduly prominent; and the work is throughout characterised by artistic forethought and good musicianship. Its popularity will doubtless be extensive in accordance with its merits."—Academic Gazette.

"They are constructed so as to fit in with the vocal principles which Mr. Behnke teaches, while at the same time they are melodious and interesting."—Tonic Sol-fa Reporter.

"This is a valuable series of vocal studies, based on the principles advocated in 'The Mechanism of the Human Voice,' by E. Behnke, and in the more elaborate work, by Messrs. Lennox Browne and Emil Behnke, entitled 'Voice, Song, and Speech.' . . . The exercises are published for each of the several ranges of voice, and from their utility and cheapness they deserve to find a very large sale."—Illustrated London News.

"These exercises are the best of the kind we have seen, and clearly printed and neatly got up. We wish the authors every success in their endeavours to facilitate the cultivation of vocal art."—Public Opinion.

"A personal experience in my own family enables me to speak in the highest terms of Mr. Behnke's method, which is absolutely invaluable for increasing the power, resonance, and flexibility of the voice, both in speaking and singing, and I am glad to be able to recommend the exercises as being thoroughly practical and most useful."—C. D., Household Words.

"The combined simplicity and utility of the plan upon which these studies have been written will commend them to the notice of professors and students alike."—Sunday Times.

"That the work is based upon sound philosophical principles is certain, and it may be said with confidence that no better exercises for the purposes of voice cultivation are to be met with."—Birmingham Gazette.

"The exercises are emphatically practical; but they are enhanced in value by pretty and attractive melody, occasionally rising far above the character of mere training compositions."—Salisbury Times.

"The authors have conferred a great boon on the musical world and on the public generally by the publication of these exercises, which so happily combine science with simplicity and system with charm."—Oldham Evening Chronicle.

"ST. ELIZABETH." *

AFTER forty years' absence from our shores, Franz Liszt is coming amongst us personally to grace the performance of his oratorio "St. Elizabeth," in St. James's Hall, on the 6th prox. The welcome that awaits him as a very distinguished man can be conceived, and no less easily can his self-sacrifice in undertaking a long and trying journey at an advanced age be estimated. Upon these matters we need not dwell, while it would be equally superfluous to insist that, though the composer-pianist's presence here will not influence the judgment which awaits his work, it confers upon "St. Elizabeth," and upon the occasion, an interest such as no other circumstances could give. The personality of Franz Liszt, so remarkable and picturesque, will cause amateurs to view the oratorio, upon which he obviously sets a distinctive value, with attentive regard. To assist this natural result, we now offer some analytical remarks upon a portion of the work. The observations will be completed in our next number, and thus, before the performance takes place, some idea of its subject will have been conveyed.

For the better understanding of the poetic character and scope of this work, it is advisable to quote from a Preface written for the English edition by Mr. C. A. Barry:—

"The Legend of St. Elizabeth is a tolerably familiar one—at least, to Roman Catholics. For English readers, who have not made themselves acquainted with it either through the late Canon Kingsley's dramatic poem, 'The Saint's Tragedy,' through Count de Montalembert's 'Vie de Sainte Elisabeth,' or from other sources, it seems sufficient to recall the following facts:—St. Elizabeth, the daughter of King Andreas II. of Hungary, was born in 1207; at four years of age she was brought to the Wartburg as the affianced bride of Ludwig, son of the Landgrave Hermann, of Thuringia. Here the two children were carefully and religiously brought up as brother and sister, and in 1220 became man and wife. Wondrous stories are told of the manner in which, by devoting herself to the poor and practising extreme austerities, she exercised all the Christian virtues. On becoming a widow in 1227, she, with her four children, was driven out from the Wartburg by her mother-in-law and compelled to resign the regency. After long and cruel wanderings in the neighbourhood, taking refuge among the poorest of her dependents, she retired poverty-stricken to Bamberg, in order to be near her uncle, the bishop of that town. On being at length reinstated as Landgravine, she renounced her rights in favour of her son, Hermann II. She died in 1231, and was canonized at Marburg, by command of Pope Gregory IX., in 1235.

"The libretto, by Otto Roquette, owes its immediate inspiration to Moritz von Schwind's exquisite frescoes at the Wartburg of 'Scenes from the life of St. Elizabeth.' It is divided into six scenes, which are identical in subject and order with Von Schwind's pictures, each being complete in itself.

"Scene I. depicts the arrival of Elizabeth, with her escort of Hungarian magnates, at the Wartburg, and the joy with which she is received.

"Between the first and second scenes several years are supposed to have elapsed, in the course of which the betrothal of Ludwig and Elizabeth has been followed by their marriage, and Ludwig, by the death of his father, has succeeded to the throne. Ludwig now devotes himself to knight-errantry. During one of his campaigns in Italy a famine rages in Thuringia; Elizabeth impoverishes herself by relieving the suffering poor around her to such an extent that she is obliged to sell some of her landed possessions. Such conduct enrages her mother-in-law, who never seems to have approved her piety and deeds of charity, and Ludwig is induced to impose bounds upon her liberality. It was this, probably, which gave rise to the story of the Rose Miracle.

"Scene II.—a landscape glowing with wild flowers in the foreground—opens with the unexpected return of Ludwig. Leisurely riding along on his charger, and singing a hunting song, he suddenly comes upon Elizabeth, unattended and at a distance from the Wartburg. Suspicious at meeting her alone, he asks her what she is doing away from her attendants, and what she has got in the basket she is carrying. Elizabeth excuses herself by saying that she has been gathering flowers, the beauty of which had tempted her to stray away from her ladies. Ludwig, who evidently does not believe her, seizes the basket, when, lo! after confession of the falsehood she has told, roses fall out, the bread and wine which she was carrying to some sick people having been by a miracle converted into roses. Both stand astonished. Elizabeth repeats that she left the house with bread and wine, and now they are roses! Is it a dream? she asks. The chorus responds, 'A wonder hath the Lord performed!' Stricken with remorse at having mistrusted her, Ludwig now asks her forgiveness; and the two return thanks to the Almighty, and pray for a continuance of His guidance. A short chorus, re-echoing as it were their petition, and confirming their faith, closes the scene.

"Scene III., presumably laid at Schmalkald, on the borders of Thuringia—for it was to this place that Ludwig went with his wife and family to meet the knights and nobles who were to accompany him to the Holy Land—represents the courtyard of a mediæval castle, filled with troops on the point of departure and the friends who have come to bid them adieu. The troops, acknowledging Ludwig as their leader, encourage each other in their resolve to fight for the Faith. Ludwig calls upon his assembled subjects to swear allegiance to him and to Elizabeth in his absence. Acknowledging Elizabeth's goodness, they willingly promise obedience to her, and to stand by Ludwig in weal and woe. After a sad but affectionate leave-taking of his wife and children, Ludwig places himself at the head of his troops, which now set out on their march to join the new crusade.

"Scene IV. opens with tidings of Ludwig's death of a fever on his way to the Holy Land. The Dowager Landgravine Sophie, his mother, now claims the Wartburg as her inheritance, and, unmoved by Elizabeth's grief and pleadings for mercy, drives her and her children out from the Wartburg in the midst of a fearful storm of thunder and lightning.

"In Scene V. we find Elizabeth, who, on being expelled from the Wartburg, has taken refuge at a hospital which she had founded in her prosperity, still exercising her charity among the poor and afflicted in the neighbourhood. It closes with her death.

"Scene VI., preceded by an orchestral interlude, takes us to Marburg. It represents the interior of the Cathedral, in which the Emperor Frederick II.,

* The Legend of St. Elizabeth. An Oratorio composed by Franz Liszt. The Words translated from the German of Otto Roquette by Constance Bache. Novello, Ewer and Co.

and a goodly array of princes, archbishops, bishops, priests, warriors, and people have assembled to celebrate the canonization of Elizabeth, which in the previous year had been ordained by Pope Gregory IX. This imposing ceremony terminates the work."

The characters in the foregoing story are distributed thus: St. Elizabeth (soprano), Landgrave Ludwig (baritone), Landgrave Hermann (bass), Landgravine Sophie (mezzo-soprano), a Hungarian Magnate (baritone), the Seneschal (baritone), Emperor Friedrich II. (bass)—seven in all; but it is laid down that the parts of Ludwig, the Magnate, the Seneschal, and the Emperor may be taken by the same singer, thus reducing to four the number of artists required. It will be observed as a somewhat remarkable fact that the oratorio contains no solo music for the tenor voice.

The poem is laid out in two Parts, each having three sections, divided into three or more sub-sections, the whole being introduced by an orchestral movement. In the plan of this Andante a gradual and almost uniformly progressing crescendo is conspicuous. It embraces much of the movement, and is worked—from a beginning with three flutes only—by the entry of instrument after instrument, till the entire orchestra is engaged at its utmost power. The thematic material used comprises no more than two short phrases:—

taken by the composer from a Church service-book for the Feast of St. Elizabeth. This melody should at once be impressed upon the mind, and fixed in the memory, for not only is the Introduction founded upon it, but nearly the whole of the first Section, and much of all that follows. It is the thematic representative, indeed, of the heroine, and will hereafter be called, for convenience sake, the motif of St. Elizabeth. Throughout the course of the Introduction, the subject submits to various metamorphoses, of a kind familiar to students of Liszt's music, but is at first presented in its primitive shape, under the simplest conditions—

No. 2.

The foregoing extract sufficiently indicates the manner in which the theme is treated at the outset. The first change comes with some imitations on the octave. Observe the form which the melody now assumes—

No. 3.

From this point the movement increases in force and agitation till we have another version of the second phrase, also imitated, and conjoined with the first phrase, now given out pompously by the horns—

Further changes await the subject. We soon hear the whole melody, in an "augmented" form, from the bass strings and trombones, which now enter for the first time—

No. 5.

This is carried on with growing power till, at the climax, the theme is presented, in full orchestral harmony, as below—

No. 6. ff 8ves.

In this effort the force of the crescendo expends itself, and a quiet episode, in the manner of the opening bars, gives contrast and relief. After a "pause," a concluding section (in common time) of the movement is entered upon, and the motif of St. Elizabeth undergoes a further transformation, which secures an enhanced effect of melody. It now appears thus—

No. 7.

A development of this occupies all that remains of the movement. It should be observed that even in the cadence, the composer is true to his plan of thematic variation; the horns and clarinets suggesting the first phrase of the motif as below—

No. 8.

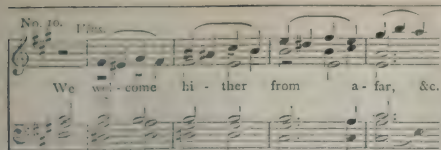

A bustling orchestral exordium introduces a chorus, "We welcome the Bride," and has as its chief features continuous quaver triplets for the violin and cello, while the "wind" interjects a joyous fanfare—

No. 9.

The entry of the voices is in keeping with the last-quoted passage, their music being confined, at the outset, to simple diatonic chords. But a change soon takes place, and we find the germ of much of the chorus in the following bars with their conspicuous orchestral melody—

No. 10. Flts.

We wel-come hi-ther from a-far, &c.

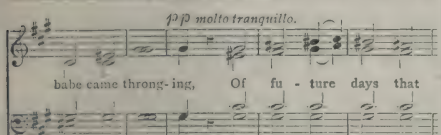

So the chorus proceeds till the appearance of the St. Elizabeth motif excites expectation. Heard first from the strings, it is next harmonised for the voices, with the second phrase according to the form shown in Ex. 7—

No. 11. dolce, sotto voce.

While in the sil-ver cra-dle still Dreams to the pp molto tranquillo.

babe came throng-ing, Of fu-ture days that un poco rit. smorz.

A brief solo of Landgrave Hermann calls only for the remark that it is attended by the now very familiar theme. The solo of the Hungarian noble in charge of the Bride (Andante moderato, D minor and major, 2-4) has a distinctly national character, and is productive of quaint effects. Its distinguishing melodic features are, perhaps, in the following flute passage—

No. 12.

with its repeated "catch" or "snap," and in another passage, also for flute, where the augmented second, appertaining to the scale with a minor sixth, is conspicuous—

No. 13.

These peculiarities give the air its principal claim to attention, and further remarks upon it are unnecessary. The Coda, and the chorus following, have as their melody a Hungarian national tune, standing thus in its primitive form—

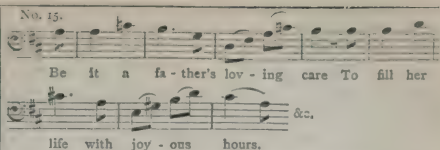

No. 14.

In the treatment, solo and choral, of this melody there is nothing to call for explanatory remark. The composer handles it very simply, using chiefly tonal harmonies in powerful masses of sound.

The vocal theme in the next number (Andante moderato, D major) is of an ordinary character—

No. 15.

but the more distinguishing—and distinguished—melody appears in the orchestra, where the following attends upon the voice, with a happy effect of sequence as well as of earnest expression—

No. 16. Vlins.

Celli in Voces.

The solo is quietly scored for flutes, clarinets, bassoons, and horns only, in addition to strings.

The vocal phrases in a short dialogue for Elizabeth and Ludwig are unaccompanied, but brief orchestral interludes separate them in a few cases. Elizabeth's first words are set to her own theme—

No. 17.

Fill'd is the house with sun-ny light.

A short Allegretto con grazia of a lightsome character connects the previous solo with a Children's Chorus, which takes the form of a principal theme with episodes (Allegretto con grazia, A major). The main subject is anticipated to some extent by the oboes, but reserved in its entirety for the voices, which sing three-part harmony on a double pedal—

No. 18. dolce.

Mer-ri-est games with thee would we play, Love-li-est flow'rs we twine thee to-day.

In this simple and entirely unaffected manner, principally accompanied by the woodwind, the leading section of the chorus is carried on.

The first episode (poco più mosso) is diversified for the sake of descriptiveness. Two examples will suffice as an indication of manner. On the words "Chasing the bright-winged butterfly speed we," the following passage occurs—

No. 19. Vlins.

while reference to the "bounding deer" involves a new orchestral feature—

The leading subject (see Ex. 19) now returns, closely followed by another episode, on the words "Lightly we'll dance to ye," &c. The most important consideration here is a graceful melody, heard again and again in the orchestra—

No. 21.

A Coda follows, based upon the short Allegretto which links the chorus to the preceding solo. It is thoroughly in keeping with the happy spirit of the whole number.

In renewing their strains of welcome, the assembly repeat that part of the opening chorus wherein a violin melody was conspicuous (see Ex. 20), an increase of vigorous expression being gained by technical "diminution" of the theme. It is now in quavers instead of crotchets—

The main basis of the chorus is, however, the Hungarian national air—

the phrases of which are again presented in broad masses of harmony. A ritornella closes the number and the scene with a tinge of sadness, as though in premonition of griefs to come. Its leading feature is a modified form of the theme used in the Children's Chorus, given out by flutes and oboes in thirds on a double pedal—

The second scene opens with Ludwig's Hunting Song (Allegro con brio, F major), which calls for little remark. There is a conventional language of the chase in music, and the composer has not materially departed from it. Hence we here have horn passages, with echo effects; rapid triplets to suggest the excitement of the hunt, and what not beside that custom ordains. The song has two well contrasted sections, the first only being written in the style just indicated. From this no quotation need be made. The second section (Un poco più moderato il tempo) begins on the words: "Oh ye lands of my home," and is effective apart from contrast. Two points of special interest present themselves; the first in the opening bars, where the complete melody is given to the clarinet, with sustained wind harmonies, and detached pizz. chords for the strings—

glad-ly roam. I a-long.
O'er thy hills and thy val-leys rov-ing.
&c.

In the next case, an independent melody for two cello attends upon the voice—

Solo.

O thou hall
of my sires.

From these extracts the character of the second section can fairly be estimated.

The whole of the division illustrating the meeting of Elizabeth and her husband is founded upon the motif of St. Elizabeth; which Protean melody appears in the very outset, for flutes alone, in one of its many forms—

No. 27. Flutes.

Both phrases will be recognised as an almost continuous accompaniment to the dialogue,

Through the section of the Rose Miracle also the motif of St. Elizabeth continues as the central musical thought. It is heard (Andante moderato, D flat) in attendance upon the amazed exclamation of the Land- grave: "What see I," &c.; being now given out by the cello and horn in this shape—harp, strings, and flutes joining in arpeggios piled up upon a dominant pedal, with a rich effect of harmony. A fragment of the second phrase—is likewise conspicuous in accompaniment, and, generally, it may be said that the whole number is but a "working out" of this one theme, the voice parts being, by comparison, unimportant.

Relief from its continuous presence comes with a short chorus: "A wonder," and the Landgrave's echoing strain—

No. 30. Corno.

But the motif soon re-asserts its supremacy. Its second phrase waits upon Elizabeth's words: "Behold me trembling," &c., and forms the ground-work of the brief orchestral passages which connect with the finale of the scene.

The duet (Andante religioso, E major) with which the next number opens is wholly founded upon the motif now so familiar. In the first instance the subject is given entire by the soprano voice—

but the remainder consists of vocal passages attended only by the fragment of the second phrase to which attention has already been asked. The effect of these can be seen at a glance—

An ensemble now begins (Lento, molto tranquillo), and we have the Elizabeth theme in this form, with full choral harmony—

No. 33. SOPRANO.

The entire thematic material is in these bars, but within reasonable limits of space its development cannot be shown. Enough that the whole subject is dealt with in the form of an ascending sequence, passing from key to key by bold transitions, the violins giving acuteness to the melody by doubling it an octave higher. The climax is a fortissimo choral and orchestral outburst, in which the voices (unison) have the motif in still another form at the beginning—

No. 34.

When we in dark-ness wan-der.

It might be supposed that the composer has now exhausted it. Not so, however. The motif re-appears in the expanded form which once before engaged our attention:—

No. 35.

A development of this, scored with richness and variety, ends the scene.

INTERNATIONAL COPYRIGHT.

OUR readers will doubtless have noticed the re-emergence of the copyright question into public prominence about the beginning of February, through the medium of newspaper paragraphs, leading articles, letters, and American correspondence. They will, amid and by means of a great deal of repetition, have become familiar with the details of the question, and would scarcely thank us for giving them a résumé of the proceedings of the American Senate Committee, or of the excellent leaders in the Times, Standard, or Daily News. But in view of the possible settlement of a much-vexed question, certain questions remain to be put, and appeals to be made, which, if not original, have at least hardly attracted the attention they deserve. Let us, however, point out that, although State revenues, publishers' and manufacturers' profits, and artisans' wages are undoubtedly affected by the passage of Copyright Acts, the question is primarily an author's question, and under that aspect alone are we resolved to consider it.

That brain-work, on being given outward form, shall carry with it an adequate return in every country into which it is introduced for the benefit or pleasure of the inhabitants, is a proposition which the civilised countries of the world, with one single exception, have exhibited their willingness to admit. The report of the proceedings of the Foreign Office, under Lord Salisbury's régime, contains the satisfactory assurance of a speedy agreement between the chief European States to a convention, on the principle that "each of the States of the union shall accord to the other States composing it the advantages of national treatment, on condition simply of the accomplishment of the legal formalities prescribed in the country of origin of the work, thus abolishing the antiquated form of double registration and deposit."

As a necessary preliminary to the signing of this agreement, an Act to remove the difficulties imposed by the existing British Law must first be passed. To meet the needs of the situation the Incorporated Society of Authors have prepared a "Bill to amend and consolidate the law relating to Copyright," which we learn, on the authority of the Standard, "has already received such promises of support that there is every prospect of its main provisions passing into law this Session. . . . The Bill does not merely patch up the old Acts and pretend to make them workable by providing new machinery: it makes a clean sweep of the whole of them, substituting an intelligible code of regulations for their uncertain rules. It proposes to bring the distinct classes of work to which copyright attaches—such as books, musical compositions, dramatic pieces, lectures, engravings, paintings, drawings, photographs, and sculpture—for the first time within the operation of analogous legal principles." Thus, in place of the arbitrary and capricious distinctions in the duration of copyright in these various classes, it is proposed to substitute a uniform term for the life of the author and thirty years after his death. Apart from its simplicity, this provision has the merit of conforming to Continental usage, the term being identical with that already adopted in Germany. It is interesting to notice in this connection how the German public has profited in the case of Mendelssohn's works, the copyright of all of which has expired in that country, while in the case of many of his later works it has still several years to run in England, the existing statute prescribing a term of forty-two years or the lifetime of the author and seven years, whichever is the longest. We may add that under the provisions of the new Bill "musical copyright and performing right are to be extended so as to protect the melody of a composition from being pirated by reducing the score or by adapting it for any other work."

Enough will have been said to make it evident to all who have not given the matter their close attention hitherto, that the current year is in all human probability destined to witness a great simplification and improvement in the matter of International Copyright, so far as Europe is concerned. But America remains behind—Devictam Asiam subsedit adulter—and the great question is whether America, in spite of the "friendly interest" exhibited by their delegate at the

Berne Conference, will continue to walk alone in the path of self-interest and dishonesty. An article published in these columns in August, 1883, exposed in trenchant fashion the motives which led American authors and publishers to agitate for International Copyright, and the perversity with which they insisted that such legislation should be one-sided. Matters have advanced a stage further since that article was written. The American market is larger, and more insatiate than ever; the practice of the Chicago and other western firms of reprinting on the eastern publishers has reached such a pitch that the fees paid by the latter to foreign authors have touched zero, while native authors are being steadily crowded out by the gigantic influx of brand-new foreign literature. To these causes a renewal of the agitation in favour of International Copyright is to be ascribed. The American author is anxious to recapture his native audience, and the American publisher yearns to crush those of his enterprising but unscrupulous compatriots whom by a strange misapprehension of the facts of the case he insists on calling "pirates." For, as Mark Twain pointed out, "since they were pirates by collusion with the American Government, which made them pirates, they had a right to be pirates." Or, as we should prefer to put it, it is the American Government, by legalising plunder, that has been the real pirate in the matter. It has demoralised the reading public by letting them taste blood, in the shape of cheap foreign literature, and temporarily destroyed that natural affection or gratitude which every reader should feel towards an author who has delighted him, and which takes practical if prosaic form in the payment of such a sum as may enable the author to derive a reasonable profit from his intellectual labour; in other words, which has led to the establishment of the system of copyright. The selfishness which underlies the course pursued for so many years by America is conclusively manifested by their action in the corresponding department of patents. The industrial conditions of America, the scarcity and high price of labour, have tended enormously to stimulate the inventive faculty of her citizens, with the view of supplanting human hands by machinery. America has, in consequence, shown unexampled productivity in this department. But the principle on which patents are based is identical with that of copyright. A beautiful machine, like the Remington type-writer, for example, represents the realisation or expression of an idea or ideas just in the same way as the score of a symphony, a volume of poems, or a new novel. How is it then that America has safeguarded the rights of her citizens so jealously in the one case and neglected them so totally in the other? Simply because, in the case of patents, she has much to lose by the absence of legislation; in the matter of copyright, comparatively little. If the productivity of America had displayed itself in literature rather than in mechanical invention, the conditions of the case would probably have been entirely reversed, and we should be witnessing the same readiness to appropriate the brainwork of other countries as expressed in machinery, as she now displays in plundering foreign ideas in literature and music. They cannot even plead, in extenuation of their conduct, that it is logical or dictated by the lex talionis. No other leading European nation legalises piracy in the matter of patents or copyrights. Why, then, should America persist in this discreditable isolation and refuse to be content with what has satisfied her neighbours without exception?

The arguments adduced in favour of the passage of International Copyright by Mr. Lowell are unanswerable on the broad grounds of morality and honesty. The leading journals, we read, denounce in unsparing terms the attitude of the opponents of that measure. But, in spite of these prosperous auguries, the outlook is described as gloomy. There is the labour vote to be conciliated, and such conciliation is impossible without mutilating the measure in such a fashion as to leave matters no better off than they were. On the other hand, we are inclined to credit the American public with a certain residuum of good sense and equity in spite of the demoralising influences to which they have been subjected. If, then, as we would fain believe, their desire to get books honourably still remains stronger than their desire to get them cheap, we appeal to them to make that desire felt by bringing such pressure upon their representatives as will enable them to override selfish trade interests and pass Senator Hawley's Bill in its original form. In conclusion, we trust that no concession may be made on this side of the Atlantic should that measure be submitted for our acceptance, hampered by those vexatious restrictions which rob it of its reciprocal character. A resolute attitude on our part might induce the American Government to reconsider their verdict and cancel the obnoxious clause.

THE GREAT COMPOSERS

By JOSEPH BENNETT.

NO. XVIII.—SCHUBERT (continued from page 78).

REFERENCE was made in our last chapter to a friend who came in the nick of time and removed Schubert from the uncongenial drudgery of his father's school-room. We must now refer to him more particularly.

His name was Franz von Schober, and he was a native of Sweden, but born of German parents. When only fifteen years old Schober met with a few of Schubert's songs. They fascinated him completely, and he resolved, on going up to the Vienna University, in 1815, to make the acquaintance of their author. This he did by calling at the house of Schubert's father and introducing himself without ceremony. He found the young composer hard at work upon school exercises, and the generous impulse of youth at once moved him to the best possible course in the interest of his new-made friend. Not being himself in straitened circumstances, the thought occurred to him—Why should not Schubert share my board and lodging and be free to work at what is truly his vocation? No sooner said than done. Schober's mother, when dutifully consulted, agreed to the step. Schubert's father assented likewise, and forthwith the two young men "roomed" together in the Landstrasse. It was, of course, understood that the musician should pay a share of the joint expenses, but the probability is that he contributed very little. The music-teaching Schubert obtained was soon thrown up, while the sale of songs, when effected at all, produced but a trifle. Of this, however, Schober did not complain, and his room-mate went on living an aimless sort of life—aimless in that it was not regulated to the attainment of definite objects—and being content to vary the exercises of his talents as a composer with boisterous enjoyments in taverns and beer gardens, among people who could do him little good. Apropos, he made a significant entry in his diary about this time:—

"The opposite of human freedom is really the conventionality of city life. The necessity of observing this conventionality constitutes the happiness of fools, but the torment of sensible men."

It is to be feared that Schubert did not always recognise the necessity. There were times when he was very unconventional indeed, and those times would have come oftener, perhaps, but for the influence of Schober, who gathered around himself, and necessarily around Schubert also, a circle of worthy companions.

This state of things did not last long. Schober's brother came to Vienna, and the composer had to vacate his room and seek another. What he did with himself does not seem quite clear. Sir George Grove speaks indefinitely, remarking that he "must have been indebted to Spaun or some other friend better off than himself for lodgings, for existence, and for his visits to the theatre, for there is no trace of his earning anything by teaching in 1817, and the few pounds paid him for the Watteroth Cantata is the only sum which he seems to have earned up to this date."

No thoughtful man can observe this part of Schubert's career without asking why it was that a young fellow of such transcendent genius, known to amateurs and professors of high rank and influence, was allowed or compelled to spend his time in obscurity. The fault must, no doubt, be laid at Schubert's own door. He had ambition of a vague kind, but his social tastes withdrew him from all the paths that led to immediate distinction. While he moralised in his diary about the hardship of Fate, he never tested the question whether what he called Fate was not really his own folly. Boon companions of his own class, and pleasures more rude than refined, satisfied the nature which the divinest muse had chosen for her favourite dwelling.

About this time Schubert added another important personage to his list of friends. This was Heinrich Vogl, the singer, a man twenty years older than our young composer. The two were brought together by Schober; in what manner let Schubert's friend, Josef von Spaun tell:—

"Schubert, who had hitherto, for the most part, been the interpreter of his own songs, aimed principally at getting hold of the Court opera singer, Vogl, whose powers commanded his warmest admiration. It was of the first importance to get an opportunity for Vogl to become acquainted with Schubert's compositions; all the rest would follow as a matter of course, so the friends thought. Schober had often spoken to him with enthusiasm about the young composer, and invited him to be present at a sort of trial of his works. But at first all efforts were ineffectual to overcome the aversion of the singer, already wearied with music, and incredulous at the very sound of the word 'genius,' after his many and painful experiences. He was obliged at last, however, to give way to the repeated entreaties of Schubert's friends; the visit was promised, and, at the hour agreed, Vogl one evening came to Schubert's apartment, and the latter, entering with shuffling gait and incoherent stammering speech, received his visitor. Vogl, quite at his ease, scratched his nose, and taking up a sheet of music paper, which was near him, began humming the song 'Augenlied.' He thought it pretty and melodious, but not of any great value. Afterwards he ran, mezza voce, through several other Lieder, which he took to much more than the first, particularly 'Ganymed' and 'Des Schläfers Klage.' On leaving he tapped Schubert on the shoulder, exclaiming: 'There is some stuff in you, but you are too little of an actor, too little of a charlatan, you squander your fine thoughts instead of properly developing them.' Then he went away without making any promise of returning. But to others he spoke in favourable terms of Schubert, and in terms of astonishment at the ripeness and freshness of the young man's genius. By degrees the impression made on him by Schubert's songs became weightier and weightier; he frequently came uninvited to Schubert's house, and studied his compositions with him, delighting himself and those who listened to him."

How true to nature and observation is this account of the meeting of Vogl and Schubert! The nonchalance of the famous singer, who had come as a patron and oracle, the embarrassment of the young man of genius, in whose little finger was more music than in fifty Vogls; the hesitancy of the artist with his "pretty and melodious, but not of any great value," and finally his discovery that the awkward, stammering youth was a heaven-sent composer—these things do not strike us as any other than what must have happened from the beginning, and will go on happening to the end. That Vogl became deeply impressed with Schubert is no wonder, and we refer to the fact only in order to quote an entry in his diary:—"Nothing shows so plainly the want of a good school of singing as Schubert's songs. Otherwise what an enormous and universal effect must have been produced throughout the world, wherever the German language is understood, by these truly divine inspirations, these utterances of a musical clairvoyance." Sir George Grove, in his article "Schubert" ("Dictionary of Music and Musicians"), very properly draws attention to the happy word "clairvoyance"—happy because the impressions conveyed by Schubert's songs is that he looked upon the sources and resources of music with a supernatural vision, and had only to transcribe what he found there. Thought seemed unnecessary to him and deliberation superfluous. He was as one "possessed" by the "demon" of his art, and it seems to have been by no means difficult for him to forget one week what he had written the week before. Apropos, it is said that on one occasion Vogl rewrote in a lower key a song which Schubert had sent him, took it to the composer, and sang it. Schubert listened with interest to his own strains, remarking, "I say, the song's not so bad. Whose is it?"

Vogl and Schubert laid the foundation of a lasting friendship by means of their early musical intercourse, and, no doubt, the younger man derived much help from the experience of the elder. But he should not have permitted tampering with his music—a process which Vogl did not hesitate to carry on in the interest, we may be sure, of the vocalist rather than of the composer. Kreissle has a note on the subject which is not pleasant reading. He says:—

"Several of these (the songs) have passed thus metamorphosed into print, and a restoration of the original readings of all the genuine songs of Schubert would be an undertaking welcomed by all lovers of music, the more recent editions differing in reading from those first issued. Dr. Standhartner and Herr Spina have in manuscript Schubert's songs, with Vogl's clumsy alterations, which, being made in reference to the operatic singer, vary very materially from the original. The 'improvements' in the 'Müllerlieder' alone amount to a dozen. We come across some fearful alterations in 'Der Einsame' and in the 'Altschottischen' Ballade, and the process may have been repeated with others of the songs."

That these "fearful alterations" will have no place in the great edition of the composer's works now issuing from the house of Breitkopf and Härtel, may be hoped and expected.

For reasons already indicated, the year 1817 was an idle one by comparison with the prodigious activity of its immediate predecessors. Nevertheless, some memorable work was done in it, as, for example, the two Overtures in the Italian style—half-admiring, half-satirical imitations of Rossini's music, just then the rage in Vienna. Schubert also composed an Overture in D and six Pianoforte Sonatas, including the published opera 122, 147, and 164. Two Sonatas for piano and violin (Op. 137), a string Trio, part of the Symphony in C (No. 6), and forty-seven songs also belong to the period under notice.

The year 1818 brought with it an entire change in Schubert's position. We have seen how he hated giving lessons in any form, preferring the most precarious means of living to independence purchased at such a price. But in view of an exceptional offer, and, perhaps, weary of living from hand to mouth, he consented to do what Haydn, Mozart, and Beethoven had done before him—namely, take service as a teacher in the family of a nobleman. The place was obtained for the young man by Herr Unger (father of the singer, Caroline Unger), and, in the summer of 1818, Schubert travelled to Zélessz in Hungary, where his new master, Count Johann Esterhazy, had a château. The Count's family consisted of himself, wife, two daughters, respectively aged thirteen and eleven, and a son of five. These children it became our composer's business to teach at two gulden the lesson, with, of course, board and lodging in the establishment. The family, we are told, was exceptionally musical. The Countess (then twenty-eight) and her eldest child sang contralto; the second daughter had a good soprano voice; the Count was an efficient bass, and a frequent visitor, Baron von Schönstein, supplied a tenor. Of course, the pianoforte was studied by all the ladies, and thus the little circle in the Hungarian retreat comprised within itself the power of making much music. This must have proved some recompense to Schubert for the loss of his Viennese liberty, for absence from his old friends and haunts, and for the sense of embarrassment which a change from his associates at Viennese taverns and beer gardens to the caste of the Austrian Vere de Vere inevitably caused.

It is pleasant to believe that Schubert was very happy in Esterhazy's house. The family soon appreciated the worth of their music-master, and admitted him to unusual intimacy. They delighted to encourage him in composition and to perform his music, while every indulgence was extended to him consistent with the discharge of his duties. Hence we find him writing to Schober that he is thoroughly well, and composing like a god because free from anxiety. His relatives envied him such a position, and Ignaz, his brother, wrote: "You lucky mortal! what a thoroughly enviable lot is yours! You live in a sweet golden freedom; can give full play to your musical genius; scatter your thoughts about just as you please; become petted, praised, idolised, whilst one of our lot, like an old cart-horse, must put up with all the vagaries of noisy boys, submit to heaps of ill-usage, and cringe in all submission to a thankless public, and stupid, addle-pated Brahmins." A subsequent letter from Schubert is not in the same strain as the first. The novelty of change had passed away, or he may have hankered after the flesh-pots of Vienna, or was momentarily in a depressed mood. At any rate, he wrote and grumbled thus: "No one here cares for true Art, unless it be now and then the Countess; so I am left alone with my beloved, and have to hide her in my room, or my piano, or my own breast. If this often makes me sad, on the other hand it often elevates me all the more." He goes on to describe the household, and, naturally for him, begins with the servants' hall, where, as Sir George Grove observes, he seems "more at home than in the drawing-room."

"The cook is a pleasant fellow; the ladies' maid is thirty; the housemaid very pretty, and often pays me a visit; the nurse is somewhat ancient; the butler is my rival; the two grooms get on better with the horses than with us. The Count is a little rough; the Countess proud, but not without heart; the young ladies are good children. I need not tell you, who know me so well, that, with my natural frankness, I am good friends with everybody."

Another letter, written at this time to Schubert's brother, Ferdinand, is one of the many interesting features that distinguish Sir George Grove's article, before referred to. We take the liberty of quoting the more important passages:—

"It is half-past eleven at night and your Requiem (composed by Ferdinand, revised by Franz) is ready. It has made me sorrowful, as you may believe, for I sang it with all my heart. . . . Things are not going well with you; I wish you could change with me, so that for once you might be happy. You would find all your heavy burdens gone, dear brother; I heartily wish it could be so. My foot is asleep, and I am mad with it. If the fool could only write, it wouldn't go to sleep! Good morning, my boy; I have been asleep with my foot, and now go on with my letter. . . . Give my love to my dear parents, brothers, sisters, friends, and acquaintances, especially not forgetting Carl. Didn't he mention me in his letter? As for my friends in the town, bully them, or get some one to bully them well till they write to me. . . . Though I am so well and happy, and every one so good to me, yet I shall be immensely glad when the moment arrives for going to Vienna. Beloved Vienna! all that is dear and valuable to me is there, and nothing but the actual sight of it will stop my longing."

The Esterhazys did not leave Zelész for the capital till near the end of the year, and Schubert experienced the "hope deferred, that maketh the heart sick." Meanwhile, his pen was not idle. He composed several songs during the autumn, and gathered material for future use, including the theme of the "Divertissement à la Hongroise," for four hands on one pianoforte. With reference to this well-known work, Kreissle writes:—"Schubert got the subject from the kitchen-maid in the Esterhazy family, who was humming it as she stood by the fireplace, and Schubert, coming home from a walk with Schönstein, heard it as he passed. He kept on humming the tune during the rest of the walk, and next winter it appeared as a subject in the Divertissement."

At the beginning of 1819 Schubert was back in his beloved Vienna, and lodging with Mayrhofer in the Wepplingerstrasse, where the two friends shared a dark, shabby, and badly furnished room. But poor lodgings, we may depend upon it, were no drawback to the composer's enjoyment. He preferred them, with a right to do as he pleased, far before the staidness of the Esterhazy abode and a need for best behaviour. Schubert's "wild shriek of liberty" is on record. He and his friends had sham fights in their lodgings, howled to the astonishment of the neighbours, cracked rough jokes, and banded about forcible repartees, in the manner of young men who, having a vulgar element in their nature, are not scrupulous about its manifestation. Yet, in the midst of all this fury of life, he was not idle. He watched, with great interest and open-mindedness, the progress of Rossini's music in Vienna, although the success of the Italian militated against the native school, and consequently, against himself. While Beethoven stormed and sulked in alternation, Schubert picked up hints from the music of the "Swan of Pesaro." In a letter to a friend, he wrote: "One cannot refuse to call Rossini a rare genius. His instrumentation is often original in the highest degree, and so is the voice writing; and I can find no fault with the music, if I except the usual Italian gallopades, and several reminiscences of Tancredi." On the other hand, some German operatic music then being performed in Vienna excited his utmost contempt. He called it "Rubbish which makes one's hair stand on end." Between Rossini and the Weigl and Treitschkes, whom he despised, Schubert, as a composer for the lyric stage, had no chance. He wrote a one-act Singspiel, "Die Zwillingsbrüder," in January, but that was not heard till some time later, and diversified his labours by producing a number of songs, including four with sacred words. As far as can be made out, however, the early months of 1819 were comparatively idle. Schubert's teaching at the Esterhazys brought him a modest income, and he was simply content to make up for his previous separation from Viennese delights by plunging into them with redoubled ardour.

In the summer of 1819, Schubert and Vogl left Vienna on a trip to Upper Austria. Whether the composer had got a little money in his pocket just then, or Vogl found his purse long enough for both, does not appear. In either case, we may take it that Schubert's careless nature found reason to take things very easily, and get all the enjoyment possible out of them. Whither the friends fared, and what were the experiences they had, must form the theme of another paper.

By F. CORDER.

III.

In compiling the following list of musical settings of "Faust," we have resigned as hopeless the idea of making it exhaustive and complete. Many local theatre-conductors in Germany have written incidental music for Goethe's play when it has been produced under special circumstances, but only unusual eminence on the part of the composer would induce publishers to print his work; thus, though we have included the settings of Rietz and Lindpaintner, we wish it to be understood that these are but types of probably dozens of other "Faust-musik" by second-rate composers, of which it is not worth while hunting up the mere names and dates. The same remark applies to Italian operas on the same subject, like that of Mdlle. Bertin. Doubtless, among the hundreds of new operas which used until lately to be annually produced in Italy, merely in order to entitle the various opera houses to their government subvention, there were plenty of "Fausts," but nothing would be gained by registering the transient existence of such works. Again, among the numerous class of Concert Overtures to which it is the custom to give distinctive titles, there may be found several called after our hero, but as these works (such as the "Faust" Overtures of Chevalier Seyfried, Christoph Schulz, and others) have no more real connection with "Faust" than their names afford, we have disregarded them. We have selected then some thirty of the more important compositions on the subject, and classified them into—(1) Incidental music to Goethe's drama; (2) Works more or less founded on Goethe's drama; and (3) Miscellaneous works having no connection with the same. Let us put this last class first, that we may get it done with quickly, as it is of least importance.

I. Works having no connection with Goethe's "Faust":—

1. "The Necromancer; or, Harlequin Dr. Faustus." London, 1731.

2. "Faust's Life, Death, and descent into Hell." By J. G. Lickl. 17—.

3. "Faust's Life and Adventures." Opera, by Joseph Strauss. 1815.

4. "Faust." Opera in Two Acts, by Spohr. 1818.

5. "Faustus." Romantic Musical Drama, by G. Soane. 1825.

6. "Mephistophela." Grand Ballet d'Action, by H. Heine (never composed). 1847.

7. Two Episodes from Lenau's "Faust." F. Liszt. 186—.

This seems the best place to mention that an obscure Opera by Donizetti, called "Fausta," exists, and has been erroneously believed by some to be on the subject of Faust, whereas it really deals with Fausta, the infamous wife of the Roman Emperor Constantine. It is a work of no merit or importance whatever.

II. Music to Goethe's play:—

8. Compositions to the First Part of Goethe's "Faust," by Prince Anton Radziwill. Published 1836. (Trautwein, Berlin.)

9. Overture and Incidental music to Goethe's "Faust." (Both parts?) P. J. von Lindpaintner. Overture alone published. 184—.

10. Overture and Incidental Music to Goethe's "Faust," by Julius Rietz. Unpublished. 184—.

11. Scenes from Goethe's "Faust," by Robert Schumann. 1848-53.

12. Music to the Second Part of Goethe's "Faust," by Henry Hugh Pierson. 1854.

13. Music to the First and Second Parts of Goethe's "Faust," by Ed. Lassen. 1876.

To this list may perhaps be added—

14. A set of nine Songs from Goethe's "Faust," by J. A. Lecerf. 1830.

15. A set of nine Songs from Goethe's Faust, by L. Lenz. 1840.

But though of far greater musical interest we cannot include the settings of Gretchen's songs by Schubert, Liszt, Berlioz, and dozens of other composers. It is not generally known that one of the principal works occupying Beethoven's mind at the time of his death was a complete set of incidental music to "Faust." What a loss was this to the world! Goethe indeed wished that Mozart could have written music for his work, but few will be disposed to deny that Beethoven, especially in his third period, was the only composer who could do the sublime subject true justice.

III. Works more or less inspired by Goethe's "Faust."

a. Vocal:—

16. "Faust." Opera, by P. Raimondi. 1815.

17. "Faust." Opera in Five Acts, by Louise Angélique Bertin. 1831.

18. "Faust." Opera Comique, by A. Ph. de Pellaert. 1834.

19. "La Damnation de Faust." Legende dramatique en 4 parties, by Hector Berlioz. 1846.

20. "Faust." Opera in Five Acts, by Ch. Gounod. 1859.

21. "Le petit Faust." Opera bouffe, C. Hervé. 1869.

22. "Mefistofele." Opera in Five Acts, by Arrigo Boito. 1875.

23. "Faust." Opera by Carl Zöllner. 1885. (The existence of this work is reported by the newspapers but is unconfirmed.)

b. Dramatic:—

24. "Faust." Drama by Michel Carré, adapted by D. Boucicault for Charles Kean. London, 1854.

25. "Marguerite." Extravaganza on the above. Anonymous. Drury Lane, 1856. Music by Tully.

26. "Faust." Adaptation of Goethe's play, by Bayle Bernard. Drury Lane, 1864. Music selected.

27. "Faust." Adaptation of Goethe's play, by W. G. Wills. Lyceum, 1885. Music selected.

c. Instrumental:—

28. "Eine Faust Overture," by Richard Wagner. 1839.

29. "Faust Symphonie." Three Characterpictures, by F. Liszt.

30. "Faust." Poème musical (for pianoforte), by Jos. Gregoir. 1847.

31. "Faust." Musical portrait for Orchestra. Anton Rubinstein (Op. 68).

It will be seen from the above list that of the six most important attempts to supply Goethe's tragedy with incidental music, one only—that of Lassen—is complete. It is not a little singular that in this large quantity of "Faust" music there should be only one actual complete setting of the play. It is, however, gratifying to be able to accord almost unqualified praise to Lassen's work, which will probably stand without a rival for some time to come. We will now proceed to review the works on our list in detail. Some may be dismissed in very few words, existing now only in their titles and the names of their composers; but others, especially on List II., seem to call for detailed criticism and analysis, as they are highly interesting and little known.

We may speedily dismiss List I., most of its component pieces having been already mentioned.

1. "A Dramatick Entertainment call'd The Necromancer," &c., mentioned in our last paper.

2. "Faust's Leben Tod und Höllenfahrt." By J. G. Lickl.

Lickl was an organist and composer of some eminence in his day. He was born in 1769, and died in 1843. Among his works is mentioned the above, but whether it be opera, cantata, or symphony is not stated.

3. "Faust's Leben und Thaten." By Joseph Strauss. 1815(?)

Joseph Strauss (no relation to the Viennese composer) was Capellmeister to the Grand Duke of Baden. Born 1793, died 1866. He wrote numerous operas, among them the above, but they have not lived. Neither of these two composers is mentioned in Grove's Dictionary.

4. "Faust." Romantic Opera in Two Acts, by Spohr. 1818.

About this work there is no occasion to say much. Readers of THE MUSICAL TIMES will find a detailed analysis in the article on Spohr's Operas for April, 1884. But we would give much to know how in the world Herr Bernhard ever evolved such a fearful and wonderful libretto out of his inner consciousness. Mr. Lumley, in his "Reminiscences," mentions the production of this work at Covent Garden in 1852, and relates that it bored the audience to death. The composer's personality too, so uncongenial and self-absorbed, seems to have given offence to the London musical world of the time. His work certainly contains some beautiful music, but it is a wretchedly bad opera.

5. "Faustus." Romantic Musical Drama. By G. Soane. 1825.

This play, of a type now obsolete, has some interest as showing what curious intellectual viands the previous generation of playgoers could digest. Some parts of it remind one a little of Bernhard's concoction just referred to, a few incidents are taken from the old Faust story, while other parts are evidently written up to the requirements of the scene painter. The author, a well-known dramatic writer of considerable ability, supplied words for musical pieces, but he might echo Dibdin's complaint, which we quoted on a former occasion, as to the composers' disregard for his intentions, many of his verses having been ignored and others altered and spoiled. The vocal score of this opera, if one may venture to call it such, may be found in the British Museum Library. It is entitled "Faustus, a Musical Romance, composed by T. Cooke, C. E. Horn, and H. Bishop." On opening this volume, the reader will be, if unfamiliar with works of this class and period, startled at finding that the Overture is none other than Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe." Most probably it was vamped up from a pianoforte copy by Sir Henry Bishop, who was great at that sort of thing, the score not being at that time published. However this may be, there the Overture stands, with only its composer's name in minute letters in a corner to betray its foreign origin. The opening number is a triple chorus, or glee of huntsmen, fishermen, and peasants, by Bishop. It was the custom for pieces of this class, like operas, to open with a chorus of entirely unnecessary peasants, just to set the play going. This piece is in D major, 6-8 time, Allegro moderato, with a longish symphony, in the course of which, after some bustling semiquaver passages, something like the opening to "Der Freischütz," the principal subject, a very striking melody, appears as a horn solo:—

No. 1.

It is noticeable that this tune is written in twice the number of bars actually necessary, the time becoming one in a bar. The peasants then sing, to another strain, two lines of words which, like Silas Wegg, I can only quote approximately—

Home! home! the sun is sinking fast.
Home! home! and (something) blows the blast.

These noble verses refuse to fit the music, so that on the resumption of the principal melody the composer is forced to confine himself to reiterating the word "Home!" all through. The huntsmen and fishermen having each had their say, a lengthy and uninteresting say, all unite in the burden of "Home!" which dies away in the distance as they go off. The various songs and concerted pieces, by Horn and Cooke, which follow, do not appear to have been written for the work, but are merely introduced by the performers. There is a soprano song in F for the heroine, with a refrain of "Come, love, to me," which recurs throughout the piece. For this Bishop has employed the above-quoted melody without alteration or amplification, being apparently very proud of it. Further still, the last number in the book is a very curious soprano scena, "O Saul, O King!" which begins pretentiously with some recitative in the key of A major, followed by a cantabile in F sharp minor, which closes in the tonic major. This has a second part, beginning and ending in F sharp major. Then we jump suddenly and barbarously into F natural minor, and after a reminiscence of the air "Come, love, to me," the piece ends with some sad vacillating between F major and F minor. This crude number seems rather as if written by a pure novice than a great composer. The only explanation we can offer is that the first half is not Bishop's at all, and was stuck on by him to his air and played transposed a semitone lower, but in printing it got left in the original key. Still, this work is well omitted from the list of Bishop's operas, for the only fragment at all worthy of him is the one melody which, as we shall see, has been turned to better account afterwards.

6. Heine's odd ballet has been mentioned in our last paper. The libretto is published in his works, but the music was never written.

7. "Two Episodes from Lenau's Faust." By F. Liszt.

These are two orchestral programme pictures in Liszt's most extravagant style. The date of publication seems nowhere mentioned, but it was between 1860 and '66. The first piece, "Der nächtliche Zug," illustrates a fine passage in the poem where Faust watches a funeral train passing through a forest in a storm. The musical treatment of this episode is very wild and strange, including, of course, an old church melody ornamented by stormy violin passages. This has never been performed in England, nor can we remember to have heard of its performance anywhere. The second piece, however—probably from the fact of its being in the Waltz rhythm, so passionately beloved by our countrymen—has made a success at the Richter Concerts. It is called "Der Tanz in der Dörschenke (Mephisto-Walzer)," and illustrates a not very refined incident in which Mephistopheles plays the fiddle to a band of peasants carousing at the village inn, and Faust dances away with a fair partner into the depths of the forest. The work is certainly not one of Liszt's best, and is quite overshadowed by his far more dignified Faust-Symphony, of which more anon.

From this unimportant class of works we now turn to Class 2, the most interesting of all, and proceed to consider—

8. "Compositions to the first part of Goethe's Faust." By Prince Anton Radziwill.

This was the first, and for a long time the only, attempt to supply the necessary music to Goethe's play. Anton Heinrich, Prince of Radziwill, &c., a member by marriage of the royal family of Prussia (born 1775, died 1833), was certainly something more than a mere "distinguished amateur." He was an earnest musician, a singer of rare taste and ability, and an excellent cello player. He worshipped Beethoven and was never so happy as when playing his quartets. He wrote a number of songs and trifling pieces which he had the modesty and good sense not to publish. But the work of his life, literally, was the Faust music. This was performed by the Sing-Akademie of Berlin in portions at various dates, as composed, and on the Prince's death the work was produced entire, and repeatedly played with success for some years in Berlin, Hanover, Dantzic, Leipzig, and many other towns. Sir George Grove mentions the only English performance of the work as having taken place at Hyde Park College on May 21, 1880, under the direction of L. Martin Eiffe. It was published in full score by subscription of the principal royal families of Europe, and a pianoforte score, arranged by G. A. Schneider, has also been put forth by Trautwein, of Berlin. Copies may be seen in the British Museum and Philharmonic libraries. There are twenty-five numbers, including the scene in the Witches' kitchen, which was completed from sketches found after the composer's death. The work is an exceedingly interesting one, though now a little faded by time, and possesses some passages of great beauty along with much that is naïve and crude. The fragmentary nature of the music, however, allows the composer to avoid exposing his probable inability to carry out a formal movement, and in the only place where such a movement was indispensable—namely, in the Overture—the Prince has shirked the responsibility in the funniest manner. "With rare modesty," as the somewhat grovelling editorial preface to the score puts it, he has declared himself unequal to the situation by taking a fugue of Mozart's for the body of his "Intrada," merely adding half-a-dozen unnecessary introductory bars to no particular purport, and a Coda to lead into the next number. The fugue, "which seemed to him insurpassably expressive of the character of the poem," is the well-known one for two pianos, originally intended for string quartet, and has the following vigorous subject—

The barbarism involved in taking another man's fugue, let alone Mozart's, and arranging it for full orchestra—scoring it badly, too—is revolting enough, but to pretend that it is appropriate in any way as an introduction to this great allegory of human life, is to add insult to injury. This is but one instance of the amateurishness which weakens what is otherwise a thoughtful and earnest work. Another is the absurdly excessive use of obligato cello accompaniments, which would make one almost suspect that the Prince confined his attention to this part of the score and got someone else to fill up the rest. This suspicion, however, is dispelled by the fact that the scoring is too indifferent (although very ambitious) not to be the composer's own.

The opening number brings before us some element of originality. It consists of orchestral music—technically called melodrama—forming an undercurrent of accompaniment to the spoken dialogue. This is a device which in certain situations can be used with admirable effect, the music deepening the intensity of a dramatic or poetic impression, but we are so accustomed to have this device vulgarised in our English melodramas that we are apt to despise it. Prince Radziwill has used it very largely in his Faust music, frequently giving, as in the present instance, accompaniments to a whole scene. But he has committed the grave error of making the music often attempt to follow the rhythm of the spoken words, accent for accent, the effect of which can only be to suggest that the piece was meant to be sung, and that the actor has either lost his voice or forgotten his notes. This opening scene, however, is not so bad. During a long monologue of Faust's, a chord of C sharp major is sustained by a Harmonica—probably meaning a harmonium and not the musical glasses—while various wind instruments give movement to the music by imitations of this phrase—

No. 3.

The Spirit which appears to Faust first speaks through music, and afterwards sings. The accompaniment to this, and several similar scenes, only consisting of sustained chords and broken phrases, of course gives us little idea of the composer's capabilities, but the Easter Hymn of the Angels, with which this scene ends, is a very creditable piece of work, though perhaps scarcely the kind of thing we associate nowadays with angelic music. It begins—

No. 4.

In the lighter scenes the Prince hardly shows to advantage. The beggar's song in the scene before the town gates has little character, and a running semiquaver accompaniment for cello seems rather out of place, but the composer betrays himself as a cello player all through the work. In the vocal score the soldiers' march, which is written for fife and drum, has a constant C for bass note instead of following the harmony. The only way to obviate this harmonic error would be to play the bass note two octaves lower, on the very lowest C of the piano. In the incantation, No. 9, Mephistopheles speaks through music in alternate bars, while a tenor voice sings each line after him. The effect of this is to make Mephistopheles appear to be the prompter. Next we have a chorus of spirits, "Neue Lebenslauf beginne," very oddly constructed. It is in 2-4 time, and at the second quaver of every eighth bar there is a pause on a chord, and we begin again in a new key; this is done no less than six times in succession. No. 11 is a still more queer specimen, being a chorus constructed on a speech which should be spoken by Mephistopheles, and the words "Wird er schreiben? Er wird (nicht) schreiben," are bandied about till it seems like an Ollendorf exercise. The Prince has set many portions of the text which Goethe never intended for music; in the Auerbach's cellar scene, for instance, when Mephistopheles electro-biologises the revellers, their astonished exclamations describing the imaginary vineyards they behold, are set for chorus, in total disregard of the poet's intention. While we are about fault-finding, we should also express disapproval of the bald stuff which is made to do duty several times as entrance music for the different characters—known in theatrical parlance as a "hurry," e.g.—

No. 5.

This is sadly unsuited to a poetic drama and inconsistent with the high tone of much of the other music. No. 16 is a piece of melodrama through which Gretchen speaks her first soliloquy, "Ich gäh' was drum," and its theme is so charmingly innocent and appropriate that we feel compelled to quote a few bars—

No. 6.

Andante.

The last bars rather spoil it by their weakness. This theme recurs in the garden and prison scenes with good effect. The whole of the love music is very tender and melodious, but where is the composer who has not felt himself inspired by the immortal garden scene? Gretchen's business with the flower is too much prolonged, the phrase "He loves me, loves me not," coming about twenty times. The negative comes twice running, too, in one place, to suit the convenience of the music. The music of this scene only has the blemish of too much cello accompaniment, the perpetual rocking arpeggios across the four strings becoming rather irritating at last. Gretchen's scene before the shrine of the Mater Dolorosa is highly pathetic. Mephisto's serenade, with guitar obbligato, is very poor, besides being scored in a way to make the fiend use appropriate language. Trombones do not combine well with the guitar. In the cathedral scene our composer has been injudicious enough to introduce an entire Requiem mass, instead of merely a few bars of the "Dies Iræ" as indicated by the poet. Here a little of that modesty which his behaviour over the Prelude was supposed to suggest would be of advantage. The prison scene is excellent, Gretchen's incoherent snatches of melody, accompanied by a "drone bass" and hovering between G minor and major, having a very distraught effect. The scene of the Witches' kitchen, printed in an appendix, hardly demands notice, having been made up from mere sketches after the composer's death. As a whole, this "Faust" music is deserving of respect for good intentions, though we may feel the composer's shortcomings. It is only strange that in so musical a country as Germany no better music should have been forthcoming for many years.

We are glad to find that the visit of Liszt to this country, next month, after an absence of forty-five years, will be commemorated by a fitting and permanent record of so interesting an event. The idea of a Scholarship bearing his name, to be founded in the Royal Academy of Music, was no sooner proposed than it found a ready response from the leading professors and musical amateurs in England; an influential Committee was formed to carry out the undertaking, and, with but only ordinary effort, a subscription list was obtained which already amounts to upwards of £630, and is daily increasing. A testimonial so truly artistic in its aim will doubtless tend to strengthen the warm welcome which will be accorded to our distinguished guest; and as a spontaneous expression of national feeling is assuredly the most appropriate souvenir of his brief sojourn amongst us which could possibly be devised. Subscriptions towards the "Liszt Scholarship" fund should be forwarded, as soon as possible, to the Hon. Treasurer, Mr. Alfred Littleton, 1, Berners Street, W.

THE decisive action taken by Mr. George Riseley, Organist of Bristol Cathedral, against the Dean and Chapter, who peremptorily dismissed him from a post which he had held with honour to himself since 1876, must gratify all who desire the welfare of Cathedral music, not only because the result has legally replaced a highly accomplished artist in his former position, but because a precedent has thus been established which cannot but act beneficially in the future. It appears that in consequence of some dispute respecting the duties of his situation, a scheme was submitted to Mr. Riseley detailing exactly the services required of him. This he declined to accept, stating that he was perfectly prepared to abide in every respect by the letter of the Statutes under which he was sworn in. The main cause of the dissension, however, seemed to be that on one occasion he had substituted for an Anthem chosen by the Precentor one especially selected by himself, on account of the absence of two leading vocalists. This, of course, musically considered, was a sufficient reason for the change; but the incident led to further correspondence, and eventually to a letter informing him that at the expiration of three months he would cease to be organist. Against this decision he appealed to the Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol; the case was tried before Mr. F. H. Jeune, Chancellor of the Diocese, and after mature consideration an order was given annulling the notice of dismissal, and reinstating Mr. Riseley in an office for which he had long proved himself to be so eminently fitted. This reversal of the intentions of the Cathedral authorities may be received with displeasure by them; but in the true interest of the Cathedral, as well as that of the music-lovers of Bristol, it cannot but be regarded as a matter for the most sincere congratulation.

IN Leigh Hunt's Tatler, of December 24, 1830, we have recently lighted upon a paragraph headed "Mr. Vincent Novello," which, now that the great sacred compositions are so frequently heard as a portion of the Church service, will, we are certain, be read with interest. "The Spectator, speaking of a new and improved edition of Mozart's Masses by this gentleman, says, with a just enthusiasm, 'There is no man in this country to whom music is more indebted than to Vincent Novello. He has introduced the sacred compositions of Mozart and Haydn into our orchestras, our churches, and our chambers. It was his zeal, industry, and taste that brought the Fitzwilliam music to light, that rescued from destruction much, and gave perpetuity to all, the existing church music of our own immortal Purcell. He, alone and unaided, has diffused more generally and stamped more deeply the knowledge and love of classical harmony than any of his contemporaries. In all his labours we may trace the purest taste and the most disinterested love of his art. There is no truckling to fashion, folly, interest, or prejudice. He is always in advance of the public taste. If he produces the work of any great author (and about no other does he concern himself), it is not lowered, diluted, and distorted in order to suit the capacity of inferior players, but presented in a form which the author would have admired and approved.'" To this well-deserved tribute we may add that some of Mozart's Masses (notably the 12th) were printed by Mr. Novello for the first time, these works up to that period being not procurable at all.

IN cordial sympathy with the object of the Maas Memorial Fund, we now direct the attention of our readers to the fact that a Committee, of which Mr. Joseph Bennett is chairman, has been formed for the purpose of erecting a monument over the grave of the late esteemed artist, and of founding a scholarship bearing his name. The Committee, a numerous and influential body, has only recently got into working order, but already considerable success has attended the enterprise, and the only question is as to the value of the scholarship that will be called after the lamented tenor. It is scarcely necessary to say much in advocacy of the claims relied upon by the Committee. The eminent position to which, by force of artistic qualities, Mr. Maas raised himself, the good service he rendered to his art, the pleasure he gave the public, and the pathetic circumstances of his early and unexpected death—all these things have been present to every amateur's mind of late, and, no doubt, duly estimated. If we mention them here it is only that, taken in connection with the proposed memorial, they may prompt our readers to help in carrying out the object which the Committee has in view. A singer is always dependent upon his friends and admirers for the tangible record of existence and proof of ability which the poet, the sculptor, and the painter leave for themselves in their works. Like those of the actor, his noblest efforts are perceptible but for a moment, and memory of them dies with the death of those who witness them. Here is good reason why we should desire to rescue from impending indefiniteness and ultimate oblivion the memory of Joseph Maas.

If it be good to see ourselves as others see us, then Mr. Silas Pratt should be thanked by English musicians for his remarks in the New York Musical Courier concerning the condition of their art in this country. In estimating the value of his strictures, however, it is necessary to take into consideration that he may be smarting under a sense of neglect and want of appreciation during his recent visit to London. His Concerts attracted very little attention, and the few opinions passed upon his compositions were nearly all to the effect that although nature had endowed him with considerable talent, he had failed to make the best use of it. We do not say that had it been otherwise he would not have asserted that "the public are fed upon the most diluted musical inspirations to be found in any capital of Europe," or that about our entertainments there is "such an air of business, which is not conducive to high art, but always a degradation of it, that it is positively disheartening to the well-wisher of England's future in music." Nor can we attribute to personal pique his just strictures on the shameless way in which worthless publications are crammed down the throats of the public at Promenade Concerts. But then, only a foreigner would for a moment dream of associating Promenade Concerts with music as an art, and if Mr. Pratt had been perfectly calm and self-possessed he would not recklessly have made the extraordinary assertion that our Concerts are, "with the exception of Richter and Monday Pops, undertaken by music publishers." Now most of us were under the impression that the "Pops" are in the hands of a publishing firm, while the Richters, however admirable they may be, are certainly undertaken solely as a commercial speculation; so that our critic need scarcely have excepted either from his general censure. But has Mr. Pratt never heard of the Sacred Harmonic Society, which is registered as a limited company, not for profit? Is he unaware of the existence of the Philharmonic Society, the Albert Hall Society, the London Musical Society, the Bach Choir, Mr. Leslie's Choir, or the innumerable fully equipped choral and orchestral amateur bodies to be found in every part of suburban London? We have no wish to accuse him of wilful misrepresentation, and must therefore charitably suppose him to know nothing of these various organizations. But criticism founded on ignorance of the facts of a case has no value, and, on the whole, English musicians need not wince under the charges made by one who has failed to master the subject of his discourse. There is much for us to do before we can afford to fold our hands with complacency and declare that England is the most musical nation on earth. But we are not so black as Mr. Pratt has painted us.

THE impression made by Liszt on Robert Schumann in the spring of 1840 is vividly conveyed in some of the letters of the latter recently given to the world by Madame Schumann. Writing to her from Leipzig, in the month of March of that year, he says: "I have been with Liszt nearly the whole day. He said to me yesterday, 'I feel as if I had known you for twenty years already,' and I feel just the same. . . . How extraordinarily he plays, and with what boldness and wildness; and again, how tenderly and fragrantly! I have never heard the like before." Two days later he adds, "I wish you had been with me this morning at Liszt's. He is too extraordinary. He played some of the Novellettes, part of the Phantasie, [Op. 17?], and the Sonata in such a way that he quite moved me. Much of it differed from my own conception, but it was always full of genius, and marked by a tenderness and boldness of feeling which I should say he did not show every day. Only Becker was there, and the tears stood in his eyes. The second Novellette, in D major, particularly delighted me. You can scarcely imagine what an effect it makes. He intends to play it at his third Concert here. . . . Would you believe it, he played at his Concert on an instrument of Härtel's that he had never set eyes on before. Such a thing as this pleases me uncommonly—this confidence in his ten good fingers." After another interval of two days he writes: "Liszt appears to me more mighty every day. He played again this morning at Raimund Härtel's in such a way that we all trembled and rejoiced. . . . In order to confer a distinction upon him and make the public realise the sort of artist it has to deal with, Mendelssohn has had a happy thought. He is giving in his honour, to-morrow evening (which happens to be Bach's and Jean Paul's birthday), a complete Concert, with full orchestra, in the Gewandhaus, to which only a few persons are invited, and at which several overtures by Mendelssohn, Schubert's Symphony, and Bach's triple Concerto (to be played by Mendelssohn, Liszt, and Hiller) will be performed. Is not that nice of Mendelssohn?" For a more elaborate description of Liszt's personality, as it appeared to a pupil in 1873, we can heartily recommend the lively and entertaining volume of Miss Fay—"Music-Study in Germany"—of which a notice appears in our present number.

THE comparatively dull time of the year again gives us an opportunity of culling from our collection of "Curiosities of Musical Criticism," most of which, we may say, have been forwarded to us by correspondents. The first is a notice of a concert prefaced by the remark that "People who cannot appreciate a recondite movement from 'Lohengrin' or 'Engedi' can listen with interest and pleasure to the compositions of Cowen or Bishop, Purcell or Jude." The performance, it is said, "commenced with the overture 'Figaro,' by the band, which also effectively interpreted the pretty orchestral effects in the overture 'Allegro,' a sparkling composition enriched with many graceful harmonic transitions." A song by Handel, it seems, was coldly received, yet if the singer, we are told, had "displayed slightly more aplomb and esprit, his rendition would have been accorded a more cordial cachet"; but when Macfarren's "Lady of the Lake" was given, the hearers seemed delighted "to renew acquaintance with one of the most touching of modern requiems." A criticism upon a performance of "The Messiah" tells us that a vocalist "was especially well received in the airs 'Heroes despised and rejected,' and 'He shall lead his flock like a shepherd,'" but that the voice of another "appeared to be in anything but good trim when she commenced with the Pastoral Symphony." The next specimen is a notice of a rendering of Handel's "Israel in Egypt," in which, it is said, the singer who gave the opening recitative "did his best to supply the place of the overture." The choir sang well, "even taking the sevenths and other difficult intervals with which the whole of the choruses teem," the Hailstone Chorus especially being "given with such swells of sweet sounds dictated by the pen of the greatest of musical composers." A movement from a Quartet, at another concert, "was impressive from its alla capella grandeur"; the rendering of it was "smooth and connected, with an effective use of the comma," and towards the close was "calando with fine syncopation." A violoncello solo, too, is spoken of with much praise, a beautiful melody being gracefully performed, "full prominence being given to enharmonic effects and portamento passages."

MR. A. C. MACKENZIE has had conferred upon him the honorary degree of Doctor of Music by St. Andrews University. We believe that this is the first occasion on which such a degree has been granted by this University.

ON account of other numerous and pressing engagements, M. Gounod has been compelled to postpone the composition of his "Jeanne d'Arc" until next year.

ROYAL ALBERT HALL CHORAL SOCIETY.

THIS Society is passing through some unusual vicissitudes of fortune. Scarcely had it had time to congratulate itself on the approaching visit of the Queen, an event certain alike to bring honour and profit, than it became the victim of circumstances of a reverse kind, rendering a performance which should have proved attractive a quasi-failure in a business sense. Considering the panic which prevailed in all classes of Society on Wednesday, the 10th ult., and the dense fog, which was sufficient in itself to keep most people within doors, it was really surprising to see the stalls far from tenanted and the upper parts of the hall fairly full. Sir Arthur Sullivan's Leeds Cantata, "The Martyr of Antioch," had been permitted to rest for a time, and to some it had no doubt the charm of novelty. In this place, however, it is unnecessary to re-enter into the question of its merits and defects. That the former greatly outweigh the latter is admitted by all good judges. The musician who could write the picturesque choruses to Apollo, and the Martyr song, may be forgiven for his comparative failure in the more dramatic portions of the work. Notwithstanding the disadvantageous conditions, the performance was one of the finest ever given by the Society. All the choral numbers were rendered with marvellous finish, the perfection of tone and nuance in the funeral hymn "Brother, thou art gone before us," causing a demand for a repetition, which Sir Arthur Sullivan, who conducted the performance, wisely declined. The contralto air "Io pean," splendidly sung by Madame Patey, was also redemanded with a similar result. The part of the Martyr Maiden, composed for Madame Albani, was interpreted with all the Canadian artist's customary charm of method, and Mr. Lloyd repeated his familiar success in the melodious airs assigned to the heathen Olybiss. Ferdinand Hiller's "Song of Victory" formed an appropriate second part to the Concert. The Albert Hall Society deserves thanks for keeping this fine, vigorous, and effective work before the public. The rendering needs no remark, save a word of commendation for Mdle. Pauline Cramer, who displayed a powerful soprano voice to advantage, and made a far more favourable impression than on the occasion of her début at the Crystal Palace some time since.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.

It may have been the misfortune rather than the fault of this Society that it delayed performing Gounod's Trilogy, "Mors et Vita," until the work had to some extent lost the gloss of novelty. However, better late than never, and the Sacred Harmonic subscribers have now received their due in the matter of a performance of the French master's latest work. Without any desire to be captious or hypercritical, it must be said that the rendering on the 12th ult. did not compare favourably with those under Mr. Barnby at the Albert Hall and Mr. Mackenzie at Messrs. Novello's Oratorio Concerts. But this was not so surprising, as in the instances named something like perfection was attained, and Mr. Cummings's task was therefore proportionately hard. He deserves much credit for the results he secured, much of the work being given in a highly satisfactory manner. At the opening the choir was rough and uncertain in intonation, but it soon gained confidence, and most of the choral numbers were interpreted in a manner that left little to desire. The same can scarcely be said of the orchestra, as there was a sad lack of delicacy and of observance of the nuances, while in the "Jerusalem cœlestis" a misunderstanding of the Conductor's intentions brought about some temporary confusion. It is necessary for the sake of justice to mention these matters, while gladly allowing that Mr. Cummings showed no want of zeal or care in his efforts to secure a worthy rendering of the oratorio. Regarding the soloists, there was also something to desire as respects the ensemble. There is no more artistic vocalist now before the public than Mrs. Hutchinson, but some of Gounod's music proved beyond her strength, and the solo "Sed signifer Sanctus Michael" was transferred to the tenor. Of Miss Hilda Wilson, Mr. Lloyd, and Mr. Santley nothing need be said, save that their parts could not have been in better hands.

NOVELLO'S ORATORIO CONCERTS.

THE presentation of Dvorák's Cantata, "The Spectre's Bride," at St. James's Hall, on the 2nd ult., for the first time in London, more than confirmed the unanimous verdict of a Birmingham audience that the vivid musical colouring of the Bohemian composer has effectually triumphed over the inherent difficulties of a libretto which, with a lesser creative genius, would assuredly have proved insurmountable. Those who read over the poem in the book of words, and coldly followed the varied scenes on paper, could but faintly anticipate how these scenes would spring into life by the aid of the music to which they are wedded; the interest, indeed, awakened by the notes of the weird "spectre motive" at the commencement being so thoroughly sustained until the conclusion, that the hearers appeared almost spell-bound, the occasional bursts of spontaneous applause whenever opportunity offered, seeming almost hurried over, as if the charm might be broken if unduly prolonged. Upon the exceptional merits of the work we have already enlarged at the time of its production at the Birmingham Festival, and have only now to record our conviction of its at once assuming a permanent place amongst the classical productions of musical art. We need scarcely offer comment upon the singing of Madame Albani and Mr. Santley, who were the original vocalists engaged in the interpretation of the work at Birmingham, but the fine dramatic rendering of the tenor music by Mr. E. Lloyd—who replaced the late lamented Mr. Maas in the part—demands the warmest praise, both his voice and style being admirably suited for the arduous character of the spectral lover. Again, the excellently trained choir, under Mr. Mackenzie, was displayed to great advantage; and if the exacting music assigned to the choral body occasionally caused some hesitation in the attacks, evidence was shown that, had more time been available for preparation, the singing from first to last would have been absolutely perfect. The enthusiastic applause at the conclusion—when Mr. Mackenzie, who conducted, was deservedly overwhelmed with congratulations—proved the hold the work had taken upon the audience, and the rapidly increasing appreciation of its composer's natural gifts. The "Patriotic Hymn," one of Dvorák's early compositions, was also contained in the programme, and, considering its many difficulties, received a very good rendering. At a Concert given by Mr. Gæussent last year, and under the conductorship of the composer, the work was first heard in this country, but the materials at command were then scarcely sufficiently strong to grapple with the exacting music, and we were therefore glad that a more favourable opportunity of judging of so original a setting of this stirring hymn was afforded. Divided into brief movements, the music of each so sympathetically colouring the words as to invite criticism as much upon its adaptability to the text as to its abstract artistic claims, the work is so thoroughly national in feeling as to appeal only with its full force to the composer's own countrymen. Great indeed, then, must be its power when we affirm that its success on the present occasion was not only decisive, but thoroughly deserved, its many phrases of pure melody, intensity of expression, and rugged grandeur being promptly recognised by an attentive and critical audience. Of Mr. Mackenzie's refined and highly poetical Orchestral Ballad, "La Belle Dame sans Merci," which commenced the Concert, we need only say that it was admirably rendered throughout, and that the composer received a perfect ovation at its conclusion. The room was crowded in every part.

CRYSTAL PALACE.

In view of the recent performance in St. James's Hall, and the fact that the calibre of an audience is, in great part, to be measured by their disregard for such considerations as distance, no more convincing evidence can be adduced of the genuine interest awakened in the mind of the public by Dvorák's music than that afforded by the numbers assembled in the Concert-room on the 13th ult., when the "Spectre's Bride" and "Patriotic Hymn" were given before the largest attendance of the season. Thus the Saturday series began again, as they left off, with one of the Birmingham novelties. The good policy of securing a body of chorallists already familiar with the work was apparent from the outset. A high level of vigour and precision had been reached at the first representation, but the Press had noticed, and with justice, that delicacy had been occasionally sacrificed to energy, and that the accompaniments, choral and orchestral, were at times unduly prominent. A further careful rehearsal proved Mr. Mackenzie's unwillingness to rest content with what would have satisfied most Conductors, and tended to entirely remove the blemishes adverted to. The achievements of the Novello Choir on this occasion enable us to dispense with the language of qualification, and to declare their share in the performance to have been wholly admirable. The spirit and precision remained, or were enhanced, while an increased attention to light and shade contributed markedly towards bringing out the subtle beauties of the work. The "Patriotic Hymn," with which the programme opened, was treated on this occasion more as a long and gradual crescendo. In this way the full vigour and freshness of the voices was husbanded until the climax, and while contending successfully with the full orchestra, rang out in the unaccompanied phrases at the close with a richness of quality and full volume which would have extorted the admiration of a Yorkshireman. The fire and courage with which the soprano attacked their high As, and the enthusiasm which animated the whole chorus, betray the inspiring influence of a genial Conductor. Mr. Mackenzie and his forces have already set themselves so high a standard, that in bidding them be true to their early traditions we are at once bestowing high praise and enjoining arduous exertion.

Of the performance of the "Spectre's Bride," it is unnecessary to speak in detail. Madame Albani, though hardly in her best voice and evincing an occasional tendency to disregard the beat, sang with that mastery of artistic and dramatic resource which renders her unequalled as the interpreter of such a part. Some critics persist in calling the part of the Narrator "thankless." Fortunately it is obvious that Mr. Santley does not think so himself, and his fine rendering of the solo "And at the door there came a knock" provoked as much applause as that elicited by any number in the work. Here the increased delicacy of the choral accompaniment contributed signally to the general effect. Mr. Barton McGuckin's dramatic experience stood him in good stead in the tenor music, and his singing throughout evinced careful study of the part. Of the valuable aid lent by the choir, we have already spoken in general terms, and will content ourselves by adding that not a single point was missed, nor one of the blemishes of the first performance repeated. As might have been expected, the Crystal Palace Orchestra were not slow to avail themselves of the opportunities for distinction which Dvorák's score affords. The great strength of the string contingent, though admirable in many passages, demanded the restraining influence of the Conductor in others. But in this point, as in every other, Mr. Mackenzie's judgment and decision deserve the highest praise.

A sparse gathering, in comparison with that of the previous Saturday, assembled to greet Mr. Manns on his rentrée at the twelfth Concert. But this circumstance fortunately exerted no damping influence on orchestra or Conductor, who acquitted themselves admirably in the C minor Symphony, for which an almost entirely fresh analysis had been written by Sir George Grove, embodying much new matter in the way of comment, illustration, and anecdote. Of particular interest is the fact that Beethoven wrote himself to his publishers, desiring them to strike out the two redundant bars in the third movement. Of the orchestral novelties presented at this Concert, Délibes's "Scène du bal" claims first attention. This is an uncommonly attractive suite of dances in the old French style, composed for the performance of Victor Hugo's "Le Roi s'amuse" at the Comédie Française, and is sure to become as popular as it deserves. The "Scène du bouquet," which contains a delightful cantilène for the violoncellos, and the Lesquer-carde are perhaps the most taking numbers of what is justly described as a most daintily scored Suite. A first appearance was made at these Concerts by Signor Bottesini, who introduced two numbers from his Concerto for double bass, and a "paraphrase" of an air by Paisiello. It is greatly to be regretted that, in the absence of classical solo music for his instrument, this renowned executant should aim in his compositions and adaptations at affording scope for his amazing dexterity, rather than for the display of feeling or intelligence. Miss Thudichum won recalls for her singing of the arduous recitative and aria "Ah! come rapida," from Meyerbeer's "Il Crociato," and a distinctly common-place song of Smart's, entitled "Birds of Passage." This young lady has, however, hardly justified the high expectations formed of her on her first appearance, a few years ago. The enunciation of her words leaves much to be desired, and an exaggerated use of the tremolo threatens to impair a voice of naturally fine quality. The programme also included Sir Arthur Sullivan's "In Memoriam" Overture, the workmanlike scoring of which received full justice from the orchestra.

HIGHBURY PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

A PROGRAMME including two of the novelties of the Birmingham Festival—Cowen's "Sleeping Beauty" and Dr. Bridge's "Rock of Ages"—attracted a large audience to the second of this Society's Concerts, on the 8th ult. The quartet of soloists engaged were Mrs. Hutchinson, Miss Hope Glenn, Mr. Edward Lloyd, and Mr. Bridson, two of whom had taken part in the original performance of Mr. Cowen's work, while Miss Hope Glenn had sustained the contralto music with signal success at the Crystal Palace in December. The Concert opened with a miscellaneous selection, the first item being a very good performance of Handel's "Occasional" Overture, in which Mr. Morrow's fine trumpet playing was a conspicuous feature. Dr. Bridge's hymn then followed, and received a spirited rendering at the hands of Mr. Bridson and the choir. Mackenzie's second setting of Tennyson's "What does little birdie say?" daintily scored for orchestra and charmingly sung by Mrs. Hutchinson, was so favourably received that the Conductor and orchestra insisted upon its repetition. Such an encore deserves recording as a genuine tribute to the composer. The orchestra of this Society, though led and reinforced by a few professional artists, is almost entirely made up of amateur players, some of whom, in tone and technique, leave little to be desired. Mr. Beddome's clarinet playing, for example, is that of a sound and finished artist, and as such deserves the recognition which orchestral players so rarely get. On the other hand, the exacting demands made by the delicate orchestration of "Sleeping Beauty" upon purity of tone and finish of execution in the strings could only be but approximately realised. Still, with these inevitable deductions, the instrumental ensemble was highly creditable, and the singing of the chorus intelligent and accurate.

The soloists co-operated loyally to confirm this success. Mr. Lloyd was in superb voice, and sang throughout with that sustained excellence which is a special mark of this admirable artist. Mrs. Hutchinson's pure style is well suited to the soprano music of this work. Especially effective were her use of the mezza voce in the recitatives, and the brightness of her upper register in the trying passages of the scena and final Duet. Miss Hope Glenn repeated her excellent performance of the part of the Wicked Fairy, and Mr. Bridson threw all possible spirit into the rôle of the King.

BOROUGH OF HACKNEY CHORAL ASSOCIATION.

A PERFORMANCE of "Elijah," of remarkable all-round excellence, was given before an overflowing audience on the 22nd ult., with Mrs. Hutchinson, Miss Hope Glenn, Messrs. Boulcott Newth and Watkin Mills as principals. The choruses were rendered with that animation and accuracy which have already become traditional in Mr. Prout's forces, the orchestra was thoroughly efficient, and the soloists were without exception heard to the greatest advantage. Miss Hope Glenn, who has never been in better voice, achieved a veritable triumph in "O rest in the Lord," and sang throughout with admirable enunciation and a fine conception of her part. Mr. Watkin Mills, though hardly dramatic enough in the declamatory recitatives, left nothing to be desired in the finish and intelligence with which he gave the airs "It is enough" and "For the mountains," and in general showed a delicacy in pianissimo passages most rare in voices of his calibre. The soprano music was given with great purity of style by Mrs. Hutchinson, who was particularly successful in the recitatives and concerted numbers, while Mr. Newth in the tenor part proved thoroughly efficient. Useful aid was lent in the trio and quartets by Madame Clara West and Miss Rose Dafforne, and the latter lady made a decidedly favourable impression by her singing of the air "Woe unto them."

The Dettingen Te Deum and Choral Symphony are announced for the next Concert, which will be given on April 12.

MONDAY AND SATURDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

ON the whole the record of these performances during the past month is devoid of startling or sensational features, no new artists of eminence having appeared, while the novelties have been comparatively unimportant. The first Concert of which we have to speak is that of Saturday, January 30, when two Sonatas of Beethoven, the Kreutzer and the so-called "Pastorale," constituted a great attraction. The former work is now generally reserved for the Saturday audiences, as if Mr. Chappell supposed his Monday audiences were tired of it. On this point it would be foolish to dogmatise until an opportunity has been afforded of forming an opinion. The solo Sonata was rendered by Mr. Charles Hallé in his very best manner, affording a lesson to students as to the legitimate method of interpreting classical works. That admirable violinist, Herr Hausmann, introduced for the first time Corelli's Sonata in D minor, from Op. 5, with pianoforte accompaniment by August Lindner. It is one of the old Italian master's most polished works. The final giga has often been heard apart from the other movements, and a few bars of it are engraved on the composer's monument in Rome. Madame Valleria was to have sung at this Concert, but was indisposed, and Miss Lena Little proved a very acceptable substitute. It has been asserted as a reproach to the public that whenever a work by an English composer has been included in the programme, the audience is smaller than usual. The fact cannot be denied, but it may be accounted for in a different way. Unless a novelty is by a celebrated composer it will not attract an audience, and it should be backed up, so to speak, by one or more favourite works. This precaution was not observed on Monday, the 1st ult., when Miss Zimmermann's Sonata in A minor (Op. 21), for piano and violin, was introduced for the first time. We are arguing of course from the popular point of view, not that of musicians who would certainly have been content with Beethoven's early Quintet in E flat (Op. 4), Chopin's Sonata in G minor, for piano and violoncello, and pianoforte solos by Mendelssohn. Miss Zimmermann's work, which had already been heard at her own Concerts, is marked throughout by high-class musicianship, and refined artistic feeling. The first movement is the most important in a constructive sense, while the second and third are the most attractive at a first hearing. The Sonata was perfectly played by the composer and Madame Néruda, and was well received, Miss Zimmermann being recalled by the small but appreciative audience. The vocalist was Mrs. Henschel, who was accompanied by her accomplished husband.

Beethoven's Septet was repeated at the Concert of the following Saturday, it is said at the request of the Princess of Wales. As a matter of course, the work drew an immense audience, as it always has done, and probably will continue to do for many years. It may be noted, however, that it has not been included in a Monday programme for three years. The executants were the same as on the previous occasion this season, and in no one instance could an improvement be suggested. An interesting item at this Concert was Schumann's Sonata in D minor (Op. 121), for pianoforte and violin. This work, like its companion in A minor, dates from 1851, the last year of Schumann's real productivity. The first movement is rather laboured, but the second is a genuine scherzo, and the finale overflows with life and vigour. The Sonata was splendidly played by Madame Néruda and Mr. Hallé, and very warmly received. Signor Bottesini introduced a Bolero in A minor from his own pen, of no great musical importance, but well calculated to display his wonderful skill on the contra-basso. Mr. Hallé selected as his solo Beethoven's popular Sonata in D (Op. 10, No. 3), and Mr. Thorndike was acceptable in songs by Gounod and Lassen. Very few words are needed concerning the Concert of the 8th ult. The presence of M. de Pachmann secured a better attendance than at several previous Mondays, notwithstanding the panic prevailing in London, and the Russian pianist was heard to the utmost advantage in Weber's fine Sonata in E minor. His rendering of the third movement, andante consolante, was unsurpassable in tone and method. Notwithstanding the length of the work, the audience insisted upon an encore, when M. de Pachmann gave Chopin's Impromptu in A flat. Beethoven's Quartet in G (Op. 18, No. 2), and Haydn's in E flat (Op. 64, No. 2), were included in the programme. Miss Louise Phillips and Madame Fasset sang some duets by Tschaiikowsky and Mary Carmichael very pleasantly.

The Concert of Saturday, the 13th ult., was chiefly remarkable for the fact that nothing more elaborate than a Trio was included among the concerted works. A Popular Concert without a String Quartet is rather a rarity, and in place thereof on this occasion we had Beethoven's fine String Trio in C minor (Op. 9, No. 3) and Schumann's Pianoforte Trio in F (Op. 80). The first-named composer's Piano and Violin Sonata in A minor (Op. 23) was played by Mdlle. Kleeberg and Mr. R. Gompertz, and the pianist was heard in Bach's Italian Concerto. The same artists appeared on the following Monday, and these two Concerts may be considered noteworthy for the number of executants who were new, or nearly new, to Mr. Chappell's patrons, for on the latter occasion Mr. A. Gibson took the viola part and Mr. Howell the violoncello in Beethoven's Quartet in E flat (Op. 74). Our native players acquitted themselves extremely well, and we hope they and others selected from the ranks of English artists may be deemed worthy to take frequent part in these world-famous Concerts in future. Mr. Gompertz was formerly a pupil of Herr Joachim, and was recommended by him as a resident professor of the violin at Cambridge. He has occupied the post for some years, and is highly esteemed among musical people in the University town. The favourable impression he created in St. James's Hall was due to his sound legitimate method and manifest artistic feeling, and his frank acceptance by the most critical audience in London should be gratifying to him. Mdlle. Kleeberg's rendering of Beethoven's Waldstein Sonata must have satisfied the most exacting critics, notwithstanding the absence of masculine fire and energy. But the touch, phrasing, and general intellectuality of her performance proved the continued existence among us of pianists capable of interpreting Beethoven in a purely classical manner without so-called modern improvements. Mr. Santley was the vocalist at this Concert.

Another huge audience assembled on the following Saturday, and late-comers had to be content with standing room. There was no cause for surprise at this large gathering, as the programme included two masterpieces of the first rank—namely, Mozart's Quartet in D minor, No. 2, and Schumann's Pianoforte Quartet in E flat (Op. 47). Each of these is unrivalled in its way, and as both received a fine interpretation, the listeners had every reason to be satisfied. M. de Pachmann, in four of Chopin's Etudes, constituted another attraction, and the Russian pianist has never been heard to greater advantage. The Concert of Monday, the 22nd, consisted of but four items, and was noteworthy for the absence of solo vocal music. In place thereof, we had Mr. Henschel's Serbisches Liederspiel (Op. 32), a series of ten Serbian national poems, to which the talented German musician has set appropriate music. The work is probably intended as a kind of companion to Schumann's Spanisches Liederspiel and Brahms's Liedesliederwalzer, but it will not compare with these originals in inspiration, though several of the numbers exhibit a considerable amount of fancy and musicianly taste. At the same time, as there is no connected story or musical sequence in the songs, a selection from them would have been perhaps more suitable to the occasion than the entire series. The composer, who presided at the pianoforte, had every reason to be satisfied with the rendering of his work by Mrs. Henschel, Miss Lena Little, Mr. Iver McKay, and Mr. Thorndike, and also with its reception by the audience. Mdlle. Kleeberg may be said to have addressed herself to students of the pianoforte, as she played Beethoven's easy Sonata in C minor (Op. 10, No. 1), and for an encore Mendelssohn's Lied, No. 30. A splendid performance was given of Brahms's Sestet in G (Op. 36), under the leadership of Madame Néruda.

M. DE PACHMANN'S RECITALS.

THE position M. de Pachmann now holds before the public is unique for the time. Whenever he gives a Recital St. James's Hall is filled to its utmost capacity, and it is said, with some show of authority, that there is more "money" in the room on these occasions than when he appears at miscellaneous Concerts in conjunction with other artists of eminence. It is of no use to call in question his right to this superior elevation, for when the public makes up its mind on any point of this kind the situation must be accepted as best it may. That M. de Pachmann is unsurpassable in certain departments of pianoforte playing is as incontrovertible as his desire to gain equal recognition in others is natural, and to a certain extent laudable. In his programme of the 2nd ult. only three composers were included—namely, Beethoven, Chopin, and Henselt. The greatest of all masters was represented by his thirty-two Variations in C minor and his Sonata Appassionata. The rendering of the former did not call for adverse criticism, but the first and last movements of the latter were disfigured by effeminate tricks of style and a lack of that masculine breadth and vigour which the master-works of Beethoven demand. In the remainder of the programme M. de Pachmann was thoroughly at home, and some of the Chopin selections were rendered with irresistible charm, notably the Nocturne in G (Op. 37, No. 2) and the Polonaise in F sharp minor (Op. 44).

MR. HERMANN FRANKE'S CHAMBER CONCERTS.

THE second of the present series of these Concerts at the Prince's Hall, on Tuesday, the 23rd ult., was even more interesting than the first, as it contained an important work by an English musician, and another by a composer as yet but little known in this country. The first was Dr. Villiers Stanford's Pianoforte Quartet in F (Op. 15), which was played by Messrs. Max Laistner, Peiniger, Stehling, and Jules de Swert. Dr. Stanford always writes in the style of an accomplished musician, and this Quartet bears abundant testimony to his well cultivated talent. From the point of view of abstract musical effect, the first and second movements are superior to the third and fourth, which, at a first hearing, appeared somewhat dry. Subsequent performances, however, may modify or reverse this impression. The other work referred to above was Julius Roentgen's "Toscanische Rispetti" (popular songs of Tuscany), a series of twelve little pieces for one, two, or four voices, after the manner of Schumann's Spanish Songs. According to Grove's Dictionary, the composer is only thirty years old, and much may therefore be expected of him, as he undoubtedly possesses great talent. A Sonata for pianoforte and violoncello from his pen was produced at the Popular Concert five years ago, and proved to be a charming work. There is no perceptible national colouring in his Tuscan songs, but they are very graceful and melodious, though not perhaps original in the fullest sense of the word. In these, as in Brahms's Liedeslieder Walzer, which were repeated, Mr. Franke's Vocal Quartet sang much better than at the previous Concert. The ensemble was more satisfactory, and Miss Bessie Hamlin deserves a special compliment on the improvement in her method. Herr Peiniger contributed an interesting little Suite for violin, by Joseph Gibbs, a forgotten English composer of the last century.

HAYMARKET THEATRE.

VARIOUS reasons might be assigned for the small part taken by the Royal Academy of Music in the preparation of artists for the lyric stage, but we do not propose to discuss them at present. Enough that until the 11th ult. the public, and even musicians, might have been excused for pleading ignorance of even the existence of an operatic class at the Royal Academy. It is now satisfactorily proved, however, that there is such a class, although it appears to be a very modest, unpretending affair, judging by the fact that at its first public performance a work requiring only four performers and no chorus was considered the most suitable for the occasion. Sir George Macfarren's opera di camera "Jessy Lea" was composed as far back as 1863 for the Gallery of Illustration, the performers being Miss Edith Wynne, Miss Poole, Mr. Whiffen, and Mr. Wilkinson. Now, in no branch of musical art has there been such a radical change during the present generation as in opera, and consequently much of "Jessy Lea," with its Bellini-Donizetti roulades and square-cut sentimental ballads, already sounds old-fashioned. It would certainly be more effective in a small room with a pianoforte accompaniment than in a large theatre with a full orchestra. Still, several of the numbers are very pretty, and some among the audience were heard to say that the composer did not alter his style for the better when he commenced to write oratorios. After witnessing the efforts of the operatic students at the above-named theatre, we are disposed to think that it was a wise course to select a work of such small pretensions for their début. The aggregate amount of capacity for stage work exhibited was not great. The soprano, Mrs. Wilson-Osman, has a thin voice, but she executed the ornamental passages with which her share of the music abounds with fair success. Miss Susanna Fenn has a mezzo-soprano organ of good quality, which, however, has not yet received sufficient training. The tenor, Mr. Lawrence Kellie, seemed very nervous, and very likely did not do himself full justice. On the other hand, the bass, Mr. Musgrove Tufnail, sang very well, and also showed some elementary skill as an actor. The performance was conducted by Signor Ettore Fiori, the director of the class.

MR. WALTER BACHE'S CONCERT.

THIS earnest and enterprising artist gave an extra Concert on the 8th ult., at St. James's Hall, for the purpose of presenting in juxtaposition, and within the space of two hours, three important Pianoforte Concertos, in all of which the Concert-giver himself sustained the part of the solo instrument. The Concertos selected were Beethoven's No. 3, in C minor (Op. 37); Liszt's No. 2, in A major; and Chopin's No. 1, in E minor, according to Tausig's arrangement of that work. Quite irrespective of the gigantic nature of this undertaking, on the part of a single executant, and with which we are not here concerned, the performance was a highly interesting one, from the student's point of view, as furnishing an adjunct to our appreciation of the difference of style exhibited in these works, and likewise of the spiritual relationship that exists between their authors. Mr. Bache played with his wonted ability and fearlessness of attack, admirably supported as he was by an orchestra of some fifty performers, conducted by Mr. Dannreuther. Between the second and third Concerto, Mr. William Winch introduced to the audience four songs by Liszt, Mr. Dannreuther accompanying on the pianoforte. Amateurs have every reason to be grateful to Mr. Bache for the exceptional opportunity afforded them in the accomplishment of the above tour de force, but in the interests of his own healthy artistic progress we should not advise him to repeat the experiment often.

MR. HARTVIGSON'S PIANOFORTE RECITAL.

MR. ANTON HARTVIGSON gave a very well attended Pianoforte Recital on the 17th ult., at Princes' Hall, when in pieces by Bach, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Schumann, Chopin, and Liszt he proved himself an artist possessing all the qualifications, both of ability and training, necessary for the satisfactory interpretation of music of a high order, such as emanated from the pens of the composers just quoted. Mr. Hartvigson was, perhaps, least happy in his reading of Beethoven's Sonata in E flat (Op. 31, No. 3), which was somewhat uninteresting in the opening movements, while the final presto, although marked "con fuoco," was surely not intended by its composer to be so hurried as to almost obliterate the identity of its component themes and phrases. On the other hand, the pianist excelled most in Liszt's pieces, four of which had been set down in the programme, including the Hungarian Rhapsody (No. 8) and the Tarantella di Bravura (grafted upon the Tarantella from Auber's "La Muette"), the former, indeed, we do not remember ever to have heard to such advantage. Musical executive art, like the various fields of modern science, is gradually being distributed amongst specialists. Mr. Hartvigson, there cannot be a doubt, should make Liszt his specialty.

HERR BONAWITZ'S HISTORICAL RECITALS.

HERR BONAWITZ commenced, on the 6th ult., a new series of his interesting and instructive Pianoforte Recitals, the programme of each Concert presenting, according to the plan previously adopted, a relatively complete historical survey of the development of pianoforte music. As on the preceding occasions, the earlier numbers are played on a harpsichord made by Burkard Shudi, a well-preserved specimen, which here does duty also for the clavichord and the spinet—those varieties of the clavier family for which, as a matter of historical accuracy, Johann Sebastian Bach and some of his contemporaries wrote their compositions respectively. Instruments fit for use, of the latter description, are, however, not easily procurable, and thus, in many instances, Herr Bonawitz's resuscitation of the harpsichord merely imparts a certain quaintness, not necessarily historically correct, to the compositions interpreted by that medium. Of the Concert-giver's executive and retentive powers we have before spoken in terms of appreciation, and there can be no doubt that his interesting scheme deserves the hearty support of musical amateurs. The second Recital of the present series was given on the 20th ult., the place of rendezvous having been changed from Princes' Hall to No. 175, New Bond Street.

MR. GUSTAV ERNEST'S CHAMBER CONCERTS.

This gentleman gave the second of a series of three Concerts of the "Monday Popular" type on the 11th ult., at Princes' Hall, before a numerous audience. The concerted pieces were Raff's Trio for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello, in C minor (Op. 102), and Schumann's Trio, for a similar combination of instruments, in F (Op. 80), the interpreters in both instances being MM. Tivadar Nachéz, Jules de Swert, and the Concert-giver. The solo contributions of the latter were a Ballade by Reinecke and a Romanze of his own composition, both of which were very ably rendered and greatly appreciated by the audience.

M. Nachéz, in violin solos by Bach, Rubinstein, and Viexieux, proved himself a virtuoso of his instrument of the first order, more especially in his execution of that test-piece for the violinist—viz., Bach's "Ciaccona," which he rendered with much verve and with faultless mechanism. No small share of the honours of the evening were also bestowed upon M. de Swert's admirable performance on the violoncello of an Air and "Gavotte et Musette" by Sebastian Bach, and of a skilful arrangement for his instrument of an "All' Ungarese," from Schubert's minor pianoforte compositions, which was deservedly encored. Miss Clara Myers gave an effective rendering of Schumann's "Know'st thou the land," and of a Scena by Mr. Ernest entitled "Thou Crimson Rose," and Mr. Edward Lloyd sang in his best manner the Romanze from Weber's "Euryanthe" and the "Preislied" from Wagner's "Die Meistersinger." The third and last Concert of the series was announced to be given on the 25th ult., too late for notice in our present number.

MR. CHARLES WADE'S CHAMBER CONCERTS.

MR. CHARLES WADE, a semi-professional tenor singer, who possesses a good and well-trained voice, and who has already acquired some reputation in musical circles of the Metropolis, gave the first of a scheme of three miscellaneous Concerts, consisting chiefly of classical music, on the 2nd ult., at Princes' Hall. The programme comprised two String Quartets, by Mozart and Haydn respectively, concerning the execution of which it is sufficient to say that the artists engaged therein were Madame Norman-Néruda, MM. Ries, Hollander, and Pezze. The lady violinist also contributed solo numbers by Nardini, Leclair, and Wieniawski; and Signor Bottesini, several of the most favourite pieces from his necessarily somewhat limited répertoire. Mdlle. Antoinette Trebelli and Mr. Wade were the vocalists, the latter being most happy, from an artistic point of view, and also most effective as regards the appreciation of his audience, in some highly characteristic songs by Dvorák—viz., "Als die alte Mutter," and "Ei wie mein Triangel." This remark also applies to the Concert-giver's delivery of the same composer's "Mein Leid ertönt," and "Rings ist der Wald," which formed part of the programme of the second Concert, held on the 16th ult. On that occasion M. Tivadar Nachéz was the violinist, of whose performance of Bach's "Ciaccona" (repeated at this Concert) we have spoken in another place, and who further distinguished himself by his refined interpretation of Schumann's exquisite song without words, entitled "Träumerei," and in the admirable contrast afforded by some Gipsy Dances of his own composition or arranging. Miss Fanny Davies gave with much effect a charming Gavotte in E flat by Reinecke, and the "Novellette" in D by Schumann, that gifted lady having also presided at the pianoforte in Mendelssohn's Trio in C minor (Op. 66), and Haydn's Trio in G major, supported by MM. Tivadar Nachéz and Hollman. M. Nachéz's artistic individuality is, as yet, too exuberant, not to say obtrusive, for him to be a perfect representative of his important instrument in the chamber trio or quartet. On the present occasion, moreover, we suspect, it had been considered unnecessary to accord a previous rehearsal to the familiar Haydn Trio, its performance presenting all the appearances of a chance reading. M. Hollman was much applauded in violoncello solos by Roche, Goltermann, and a Mazurka of his own composition. Mrs. Hutchinson gave a pleasing rendering of Lassen's "Der Schäfer putzte" (from the "Faust" music), and Mackenzie's "What does little birdie say," and was likewise associated with Mr. Wade in Berlioz's beautiful duet "O nuit d'extase" from the opera "Les Troyens." The last of these very enjoyable Concerts will take place on the 5th inst., when Brahms's Liebeslieder Walzer will be one of the attractive features.

MUSIC IN BIRMINGHAM.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

THE second of Dr. Heap's series of Chamber Concerts, which took place at the Masonic Hall, on the 5th ult., drew a larger attendance than its predecessors, in virtue presumably of its superior attractions. The executants were Messrs. Carrodus, Speelmann, Bernhardt, and Vieuxtemps, as the quartet of strings, with the addition of Dr. Heap as pianist, and Mr. E. Carrodus, son of the popular Concert-Meister, as contra-bassist. Mozart's String Quartet in D minor, second of the set dedicated to Haydn, furnished an irreproachable commencement of the Concert, which was effectively concluded by a masterly performance of Professor Macfarren's Quintet in G minor, for piano and strings, which is a comparative novelty here. The most striking effect, however, was produced in Beethoven's grand Trio in B flat (Op. 97), for piano and strings, the playing of which by Dr. Heap, Mr. Carrodus, and M. Vieuxtemps evoked enthusiastic applause. Mr. Carrodus gave an excellent rendering of the solo part of the Andante and Finale from Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto, but, failing the proper orchestral support, the performance was necessarily shorn of much of its due effect. In like manner, Dr. Heap was placed to some extent at a disadvantage in playing a pianoforte arrangement of Chopin's Polonaise in E flat, after the same composer's Andante Spianato. At the next Concert of the series we are promised Brahms's Pianoforte Quartet in G minor.

On the afternoon of the 6th ult. an interesting Chamber Concert was given by the musical section of the Midland Institute, in the theatre of that building. The performers were Mr. E. Howell (violin), Dr. R. Winn (pianoforte), Mr. F. Ward (violin), and Miss Simpson (vocalist). The instrumental pieces comprised Mendelssohn's Pianoforte and Violoncello Sonata in D major (Op. 58), a Melody by Molique, a Tarantelle by Lachner (for violoncello), and Schubert's grand Trio in B flat (Op. 99), for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello. Mr. Howell's fine tone and finished technique were revealed to special advantage in the solos, which were warmly applauded, but the musical treat of the Concert was the Schubert Trio, which was superbly rendered. Miss Simpson's vocal selection included Pinsuti's "Heaven and Earth" and Hatton's "The Enchanters."

Special interest attached to the third of the current series of Mr. Stockley's Orchestral Concerts, which took place on the 18th, by reason of the presence of Mr. E. Prout as Conductor of his own Symphony in F, which was produced with such conspicuous success at last year's Birmingham Festival. Another interesting feature of the Concert was the first appearance here of Mdlle. Antoinette Trebelli, with whom was associated, in the vocal department, Madame Patey. The telling quality of the young lady's voice, a sweet and flexible soprano, and the excellence of her method, as displayed more particularly in Mozart's "Deh vieni" ("Figaro") and the Shadow Song from "Dinorah," abundantly justified the cordial reception extended to her for her mother's sake, and won her cordial applause and recalls after each effort. Madame Patey, who sang with her accustomed fervour and effect, was especially successful in the beautiful air from Gounod's "Faust"—"Quando a te lieta"—in which she was admirably accompanied on the violoncello by Mr. Ould. The latter artist won great applause by his playing of the andante from Goltermann's Third Concerto, and a Tarantella by the same composer; and Dr. R. M. Winn was effective in Mendelssohn's Capriccio in B (Op. 22). The feature of the Concert, however, was the Symphony of Mr. Prout, the melodic charms and rhythmical graces of which were well brought out in the performance. Each of the four movements was vigorously applauded, and the composer was enthusiastically recalled on the conclusion of the work. Other noteworthy triumphs of the band were achieved in Sterndale Bennett's Overture to the "May Queen," Praeger's "Manfred," Poème Symphonique, and the Nocturne and Tarantella from Raff's Italian Suite.

The last Concert of the Philharmonic Union series, which took place in the Town Hall, on the 25th ult., was devoted to Handel's "Judas Maccabæus," a work which had not been heard in Birmingham for some years previously. The principals were Madame Wilson-Osman, Mrs. Mellor, Miss Fountain, Mr. H. Hagyard, and Mr. R. Grice. Mr. Felix Corbett officiated at the organ, and Dr. Swinnerton Heap, as usual, conducted.

The usual spring season of the Carl Rosa Opera Company in Birmingham, expanded this time from a week to a fortnight, commenced at the new Grand Theatre on the 15th. Both the locale chosen and the date constituted new departures, the previous visits of the company being invariably paid to the Theatre Royal at a later period of the season; but these innovations appeared to have no ill effect upon the attendance, which was as large as on any former occasion. Several changes were noticed this time in the company, in which the Birmingham public were gratified to welcome back Madame Julia Gaylord, Mr. Packard, and Mr. Aynsley Cook, but the only musical novelties brought forward were the English adaptation of M. Maillart's "Fadette," better known as "Les Dragons de Villars," and Mr. Goring Thomas's new and successful opera "Nadesha." The light and tuneful character of the former work, and the humour, spirit, and genuine histrionic skill displayed by Madame Marie Roze in the part of the bucolic heroine, won for the work a prompt, popular success which fully justified its repetition. "Nadesha," though splendidly mounted and admirably performed, appealed rather to the cultured few than to the general public. Its merits were frankly and cordially recognised by local musicians and amateurs, who were especially impressed by the dramatic qualities of the music, the richness of the orchestral colouring, and the excellence of the concerted pieces. Madame Georgina Burns won golden opinions by her impersonation of the beautiful and heroic serf girl, and repeatedly excited the enthusiasm of the audience by the fervour and brilliancy of her vocalisation; and her efforts were ably seconded by the impressive singing and acting of Mr. Barton McGuckin as Voldemar, and of Mr. Leslie Crotty in the part of the envious and treacherous brother, Ivan. Mr. Max Eugene also produced a very favourable impression by the force and incisiveness of his performance in the part of the gloomy serf, Ostap. In addition to the two new operas, the Company has appeared with much success in a number of old favourites, including "Mignon," "Carmen," "Faust," "Esmeralda," "Il Trovatore," and "The Bohemian Girl."

MUSIC IN LIVERPOOL.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

THE sixth Concert of Mr. Hallé's series took place on January 26, but was not remarkable for the introduction of any special novelties. The orchestral pieces comprised an intelligent performance of the Overture to Mendelssohn's "Athalie," and a very interesting rendering of Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding" Symphony. This work makes somewhat of a departure from the strict form and consecutiveness of symphonic movements; and the fourteen variations of the Wedding March, moderato molto, become almost wearisome in their reiteration. The Serenade, and the Dance with which the Symphony concludes are, perhaps, the most enjoyable sections, and are full of bright, vivacious writing. The other contributions of the band included Saint-Saëns's Poème Symphonique, "Danse Macabre," and the Overture to Mozart's "Der Schauspieler Director." Mr. Charles Hallé's conception of Beethoven's "Emperor" Concerto, which figured prominently in the programme, is so well known that comment is needless. The only vocalist at this Concert was Mdlle. Antoinette Trebelli, who thus made her début in Liverpool, and by the judicious choice of her selections, and the ease and finish with which their difficulties were surmounted, she proved herself capable of sustaining the potency of the family name.

Again has Mozart's name appeared at these Concerts with the singular apostrophe "first time" noted against the work; and Mr. Hallé merits every commendation for introducing such a rich and diversified specimen of the master of melody's genius. It seems scarcely comprehensible that a work marked with all the best evidences of Mozart's skill should have been allowed to remain unnoticed in England, with one solitary previous exception, for more than a hundred years, until again brought to light at the Concert of the 9th ult. The Serenade consists of nine movements—some, it is true, of unusual brevity; but the concertante, in which several solo passages for flute and oboe occur, and the finale, bear the palm for beauty of theme and workmanship. The second portion of the programme was entirely comprised of Wagnerian selections—a fitting contrast to the Serenade immediately preceding—and the manifest interest of the audience in every item showed the advance which has been made by this school of writing in popular estimation. The Overture to "Die Meistersinger," the Introduction and closing scene of "Tristan and Isolde," the weird "Ride of the Walkyries," which earned a pronounced encore, and the Passion scene from "Parsifal," are sufficiently varied specimens to throw into relief the most marked contrasts in Wagner's compositions, and the effect was heightened by the vocal assistance rendered by Mr. Henschel in Hans Sachs' monologue in "Die Meistersinger," and in the "Walkyrie" selections. The Concert also included an excellent performance of Beethoven's "Coriolan" Overture.

The Philharmonic Society's ninth Concert, held on the 2nd ult., showed somewhat of an advance in interest over its predecessors. This was largely due to the reappearance of Señor Sarasate. Sarasate's forte lies rather in clever execution and brilliancy of technique than in the powerful exposition of great classical works, and whilst the Mendelssohn Concerto was played in a perfectly impeccable manner, with ample regard to finish and delicacy, the phenomenal executive powers of the Spanish virtuoso were displayed to better advantage in two items of his own composition—(a) Ballade (Op. 31) and (b) Jota Aragonesa, which elicited quite a storm of enthusiasm. The orchestral work comprised Schumann's "Rhenish" Symphony in E flat, and the choir combined in a very creditable performance of the "Lohengrin" bridal chorus. Miss Hope Glenn, as solo vocalist, gave some very varied and interesting selections, including the "Weaving Song," from the late Philharmonic Conductor's famous and exacting cantata "Odysseus." Mr. Hallé, as usual, conducted the entire Concert.

A better opportunity of appreciating the artistic abilities of Señor Sarasate was afforded by a Morning Recital, held in the small Concert Room of St. George's Hall, on Saturday, the 20th ult. The programme on this occasion included Schubert's Fantaisie in C (Op. 159), a Concert-stuck by Saint-Saëns, an Example of Wagner, adapted by Wilhelmj, and two or three specimens of the violinist's own compositions. The impression created by the entire performance was generally a confirmation of previously expressed opinions. Mr. W. G. Cusins accompanied Señor Sarasate, and, in addition to assisting in the Schubert Fantaisie, he played Chopin's Andante Spianato and Polonaise in E flat and the March from "Tannhäuser."

The Carl Rosa Opera Company, after reaping in Liverpool an exceptionally "golden" harvest, has now left us for other scenes. It is, however, necessary that some recognition should be made of the first performance in English of Marchetti's tragic Opera "Ruy Blas." True to promise, this, the last of the novelties, was presented to an overwhelming and critical audience on the night of the 4th ult., and its generally favourable reception was fully warranted by the care and attention, even to the smallest detail, which had evidently been bestowed upon its production. The Opera, in its Italian form, has already been heard in the Metropolis, if not in the provinces, and it is unnecessary, therefore, to enter into the characteristics of the always vivid and impressive orchestration, with the constantly recurring Leitmotive, supposed to be indicative of the personality of Ruy Blas. The performers had evidently prepared themselves for the importance of the occasion, and Madame Roze as the Queen, Miss Burton as Casilda, Mr. Valentine Smith in the title rôle, and Mr. Leslie Crotty as the Machiavellian Don Sallust, especially distinguished themselves. Mr. Goossens conducted with his usual intelligence.

MUSIC IN MANCHESTER.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

For his Fourteenth Concert, given on Thursday, January 28, Mr. Hallé engaged Herr Hausmann, the eminent cellist, who, in Schumann's Concerto (Op. 129), and in other, not very happily chosen, pieces, displayed an agreeable though not over-powerful tone, a refined style, and very considerable executive skill. At the same concert, Mr. Santley was received enthusiastically by many old friends, whom he delighted by an exhibition of renewed power, and of something of his former robustness of voice, and by many new friends, who could not but admire the vigour and manliness of his vocalisation. The orchestral selection included that wonderful fragment—Schubert's unfinished Symphony in B minor (in which the playing was worthy of the composition)—and Liszt's Poème Symphonique, "Tasso." Mr. Hallé's subscribers are grateful to him for the persevering production of orchestral works demanding for their due rendering unstinted care and energy, and they have a right to expect the presentation of any compositions marking distinct historic steps in art achievement. Of Liszt's power of orchestration and knowledge of varied effects no question could arise, although it is doubtful whether, occasionally, the tone colouring is not of a somewhat melodramatic nature. But, altogether apart from any novelties or peculiarities of scoring, the larger works of the author must intensely interest all earnest students, inasmuch as they show a wonderful capacity for elaborating imposing structures out of apparently insignificant materials, of developing to the very utmost the slight themes which form the texts of the high-sounding discourses. Perhaps in few of his works has Liszt displayed a more masterly grasp of one chief idea, a keener perception of the extent of its range, or a greater patience in unfolding its varied meanings, than in "Tasso." But it must be confessed that the patience of his listeners also is exercised; and an impression is left that continued, unceasing repetition is not argument; that no law of art forbids contrast which is congruous and worthy, and that the elucidation of an idea is often aided more by light deduced from collateral, and perhaps at first glance apparently opposed, fancies, than by persistent reiteration of one theme. That the recognised classical masters believed in, and laboured to mature, an ever-widening breadth of design, is undeniable. Still it is quite a mistake, and a very common one, to suppose that the composers who follow a somewhat indistinctly marked outline, altogether deny the necessity for regularity of proportion. Only in music—as is now somewhat the fashion in other art manifestations—they give us studies in shades of a single colour, rather than admit into their compositions the relief and help which may be derived from complementary tints; they rigidly confine themselves (in their structural devices, not in their orchestral expression) to the pursuit of one line of thought; forgetful, as it would appear, of those natural laws of reaction which the older authorities intuitively perceived. The "Orpheus" Poème Symphonique of Liszt (which was given on the 18th) is of softer character than the "Tasso," more pleasing, and less pretentious; nevertheless, the workmanship is more evident than the poetic inspiration.

The performance of "Elijah," on the 4th ult., was certainly the best we have had in Manchester, and redounded greatly to the credit of the able choirmaster, Mr. E. Hecht. Exception must be taken to the speed of some of the movements. Singers take great and unwarrantable liberties in this respect, or rather in this want of respect, for an author's intention. A Conductor ought to exercise an absolute sway in the presentation of all the details of a large and important work, and not to suffer the general design to be frittered away to suit the convenience, or to meet the whims, of half-a-dozen execrants brought together in a haphazard kind of way. Miss Anna Williams pleased more in the great soprano air than in the Widow's part; and Miss Hope Glenn—in spite of a false start—came nearer to a true realisation of the spirit of "O rest in the Lord" than of the Jezebel music. It is to be hoped that some day a contralto may arise who will perceive the meaning of "Woel unto them." Mr. Lloyd sang very well, and Mr. Santley confirmed the pleasure with which, at the previous Concert, a crowded audience hailed his return to health and to a large degree of his early force and spirit. Mr. Barrow did good service in the solo parts not properly belonging to the rôle of the Prophet.

On the 11th ult., Madame Norman-Néruda attracted, as usual, a very large audience, and played with unequalled finish and delicacy, and with unsurpassed dash, Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto. With pleasure I notice that one of our local critics, with true appreciation, and with commendable freedom of judgment, was so deeply stirred as to write that "at any rate Mendelssohn wrote the greatest Oratorio and the greatest violin Concerto of modern times." In Beethoven's Septet, Madame Néruda was admirably supported by Messrs. Straus, Grosse, Paersch, Hutchins, Vieuxtemps, and Prokatzky, the performance exciting and deserving great applause. At the same Concert, Mr. Piercy sang, with considerable taste, Handel's "Where'er you walk," Weber's "Waft me, ye zephyrs" ("Euryanthe"), and Sullivan's "Where is the crown and palm-like grace" ("Martyr of Antioch").

It is remarkable how persistently our best vocalists now draw their highest inspiration from Handel's inexhaustible store. In no song did Mr. Santley create a greater effect than in the "Del Minacciar" from "Ottone"; and, on the 18th ult., Herr Henschel's happiest effort was the "Siroë M'ascolta" of the same mighty master. At the last mentioned Concert, Mr. Hallé (who had for some weeks modestly given place to other soloists) reappeared, playing Beethoven's great C minor Concerto with his customary delicacy and grace, and investing Chopin's Scherzo in B flat minor with a charm belonging more to the interpreter than to the somewhat fragmentary composition itself. The Symphony was Mozart's No. 5 in D, which is now (with its added wind parts) registered as No. 35; and the shorter—but scarcely lighter—pieces included Wagner's "Ride of the Walkyries," to which I hope no more wind parts will ever be added.

Mr. de Jong has brought a busy, and I hope a successful, campaign to a close; and his benefit is announced for the 6th inst. During his series of Concerts he has introduced several acceptable vocalists who, otherwise, would not have become known to a Manchester audience. Of these I must mention Miss Annie Lea, who made a distinctly favourable impression; Mr. Grove, a young bass singer of intelligence, but with much to learn; and Mr. Athley Thomas, who, in "Elijah," agreeably surprised his hearers. He has also afforded some of our local artists opportunities of being heard amid more favourable circumstances than they generally enjoy; and Miss Conway, in particular, has raised herself a step in popular esteem. But Mr. de Jong has also had the assistance of Madame Trebelli, Messrs. Lloyd, H. Guy, and Maybrick, and many other well-known vocalists; and for his Benefit Concert he promises a host of talent, including Mr. Sims Reeves and Signor Bottesini.

An attempt has been made to justify a performance which was given on the 8th ult., at the Concert Hall, by the plea of its being in keeping with the style of the original Gentlemen's Concerts; so-called, I suppose, as a snub to artists of higher grade. The programme included Sullivan's "Kenilworth"—of which for many years we have been promised a second and enlarged edition that does not yet appear—Dr. Bridge's "Rock of Ages," and Prout's Symphony in F, which occupied the second part of the short programme, and was by far the best executed item of the whole. Mr. C. J. Hall (solicitor) conducted, the choir consisting of a suburban (Fallowfield) Choral Society, and the band being partly formed from that of the Amateur Dramatic Society.

Mr. Hallé's Pianoforte Recitals continue at short intervals; that of the 22nd ult. including Weber's Sonata in A flat, the first book of Schumann's "Davidsbündler Tanze," and several other pieces.

Our local, and truly admirable, chamber-music party, under Signor Risegari's leading, gave its concluding performance on the 11th ult.; and, having the assistance of Mr. Hecht, presented, with great acceptance, Brahms's Quintet in F minor (Op. 34) and Schumann's Phantasie-Stücke in A minor. It is devoutly to be wished that, by association with some other body of musicians, or else by increased interest excited among the public, this Society could be more prominently brought forward and meet with greater reward.

MUSIC IN YORKSHIRE.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

SINCE my last communication we have had almost a plethora of Concerts, all more or less interesting to amateurs generally. In point of musical value Mr. Ford's popular Concerts continue to stand in the front rank, but they do not always attract the multitude in such numbers as they deserve. That this should have been the case at the fourth Concert, which was given on January 27, is matter for some astonishment in view of the attraction which was offered. The Concert was almost entirely orchestral, and the programme was largely in the hands of the band of Mr. Manns. Possibly the comparative want of interest shown may be attributed to the fact that the same band appeared at the previous Concert. The "Eroica" Symphony lost nothing of its grandeur and sublimity through the rendering, which was strong, reliant, and radiant in tone and expression. How much of the commanding spirit of the Conductor is infused into the players was shown over and over again, not only in the dash and vigour of Beethoven's noble finale, but in the refinement and delicacy of the performance of Cowen's charming Suite "The Language of the Flowers." The latter was somewhat of a novelty and created a very favourable impression. The "Oberon" Overture was an equally brilliant performance. Mr. Carrodus gave the violin solo of Mendelssohn's Concerto for violin and orchestra in E minor, and it almost goes without saying that he had a warm reception among his Yorkshire friends; but apart from association and sympathy between him and the audience, his technique and finished interpretation were worthy of general admiration. The vocalist was Mr. Harper Kearton, whose clear tenor voice was displayed to excellent advantage in the "Prayer" from "Rienzi," and Plotow's romance "M'appari." At the fifth Concert, held on the 9th ult., Mr. Ford's patrons had once more a rare musical treat, in the shape of solo and concerted performances by Madame Norman-Néruda, Mr. Charles Hallé, and M. Vieuxtemps. A better rendering of the Kreutzer Sonata it would be impossible to imagine. The same composer's Trio in D (Op. 70, No. 1) was an equally successful performance of its kind, but its effect was wholly different upon the audience. Madame Norman-Néruda's solo was the familiar Adagio from Spohr's Ninth Concerto, which received clever treatment, as did also a graceful little item by Wieniawski which the violinist gave as an encore piece. Schubert's Fantasia-Sonata (Op. 78), by Mr. Hallé, and a solo by Popper played by M. Vieuxtemps and encores, completed an instrumental programme of surpassing interest. Miss Clara Samuelli's rich voice and agreeable style were highly appreciated, and a word of praise is due to Mr. Alfred Broughton who officiated as accompanist.

Dr. Spark's Organ Recitals, at the Leeds Town Hall, continue a powerful source of attraction not only to working people, who have little opportunity for attending musical performances during the week, but to many earnest musicians. The Borough Organist generally contrives to mix a good deal that is fresh and novel with representative works of a high class, and the facility with which he handles the instrument enables him to make selections from a wide range of compositions. The educational value of his Recitals is therefore of some importance. In such pieces as Beethoven's Funeral March and the appropriate Handelian air which he played on January 23, in memory of the late Joseph Maas, Dr. Spark is thoroughly at home. His exposition of new organ pieces which from time to time are published by clever composers for that instrument is an admirable feature of his Recitals. One of such pieces, a Fantasia by the well-known Mayence Organist, Frederick Lux, produced at the Concert on the 13th ult., attracted general attention.

Berlioz's "Faust" was given for the second time in Leeds, at the Coliseum, on the 16th ult. The performance drew together a crowded audience. The solo work was in capable hands—namely, Madame Albani, Mr. Lloyd, and Mr. Santley. The Canadian cantatrice brought to bear, in addition to rich and cultured vocalism, fine dramatic ability. Her treatment of the "King of Thule" ballad was scarcely so acceptable as that of the lady who is usually associated with the part of Marguerite. Mr. Lloyd was in good form, and Mr. Santley, although not in the best voice, gave an attractive colour to his part. The chorus—which was largely constituted of the Bradford Festival Choral Society—was inefficient, and the band was far from equal to the demands made upon it. Mr. Burton was the Conductor.

Mr. Edgar Haddock's Musical Evenings continue to attract many musicians to the Leeds Philosophical Hall. In addition to Miss Amina Goodwin, mentioned in my last letter as having appeared, Fräulein Marie Krause, Herr Max Pauer, and Mr. Owen Williams have given exhibitions of their skill. Fräulein Krause, who appeared on January 29, created a favourable impression, more by reason of a refined and thoughtful rendering of one of Chopin's compositions than by a vigorous performance of the unsatisfactory Wagner-Liszt arrangement of the "Tannhäuser" March. With Mr. Haddock the same pianist joined in a performance of Beethoven's Sonata in A (Op. 12, No. 2)—one of the ten which Mr. Haddock undertakes to produce during the series—and Mozart's Sonata in D. Herr Max Pauer addressed himself chiefly to Beethoven's Sonata (Op. 101), in the performance of which he showed the possession of great powers of technique and of much taste.

At the Bradford Church Institute Mr. Midgley gave an interesting Concert on January 29. Something of novelty was infused into the programme by the introduction of concerted vocal music, admirably rendered by the Misses Tomlinson and Miss Hoschke. Brahms's Trio "The Gardener," Gounod's Barcarole Duet, and operatic excerpts from Spohr constituted the vocal fare, and the innovation proved highly agreeable. The instrumental part of the Concert included Sonatas for the pianoforte and violin by Beethoven, Dvorák, and Mozart, in the performance of which Mr. Midgley and Herr Straus brought to bear technical skill and intellectual ability of a high order. Each of the executants also gave a solo.

Herr Isidor Cohn, a pupil of Scharwenka, made a promising début at an Invitation Pianoforte Recital given by him, on the 3rd ult., in the Bradford Church Institute. Herr Cohn combines executive ability, apparently equal to the most difficult music, with refined taste.

A more successful Concert has not been held during the season than that which was given under the auspices of the Bradford Subscription Concerts Committee, in St. George's Hall, on the 12th ult. The house was crowded in every part, and the audience was at the pitch of enthusiasm from beginning to end. Señor Sarasate gave a truly marvellous exhibition of his skill, though he addressed himself almost exclusively to the interpretation of his own compositions, which could be regarded as little better than show pieces. His "Faust" Fantasia afforded him an opportunity of shining in every form of his art, in wondrous facility of fingering and bowing, in passion and fervour, and in exquisite tone-producing power. Signor Bottesini's performance was equally clever, though less imposing. The solo pianist was Mr. W. G. Cusins, who played, amongst other things, the Wagner-Liszt arrangement of the March from "Tannhäuser." The vocalists were Madame Trebelli, Miss Carlotta Elliot, Mr. Guy, and Mr. Maybrick. Signor Bisaccia was the accompanist.

MUSIC IN THE WEST.

WE are now in the midst of the usual hurry and rush of Concerts peculiar to the last few weeks before Lent. So far the audiences have not apparently been diminished by the crowding together of so much music, and we hope that the attendance at the first of the Monday Popular Concerts at Bristol, to be given this evening, the 1st inst., will be thoroughly satisfactory, as indeed it certainly ought to be, considering the attractions offered. The programme includes Prout's Grand Symphony in F (No. 3); Overtures: "Die Meistersinger" (Wagner), Der Freischütz (Weber), and Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsody in F. This Concert will be followed, on the 3rd inst., by the last of Mr. Pomeroy's classical Chamber Concerts for the present season; and on the 4th inst. we look forward to the annual "Ladies' Night" of the Orpheus Glee Society. An interesting programme is in rehearsal, under the direction of Mr. George Riseley.

At the second Popular Concert, on the 15th inst., Mr. Walter Macfarren will be the pianist; and at the third Concert Beethoven's Choral Symphony and Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" will form the programme, and, to judge from the rehearsals, will receive a splendid interpretation at the hands of Mr. Riseley's band and choir.

Last month there were several Concerts of great interest. We have to chronicle the first appearance in Clifton of Mr. Ralph Livings, a highly gifted young pianist, who made a most favourable impression on the somewhat critical audience present at the third of Mrs. Viner Pomeroy's Chamber Concerts, on the 3rd ult. Mr. Livings has received his musical education at the Leipzig Conservatoire, and possesses remarkable delicacy of touch and correctness of execution. He was associated with Mr. Henry Holmes in Grieg's Sonata in F major, for pianoforte and violin, and gave the greatest satisfaction by his exquisite rendering of the music. Mr. Livings also contributed, as solos, three selections from Schumann, and Moszkowski's Tarantelle (Op. 27), and in these he was also successful, though hardly so conspicuously so as in the duet. The first item on the programme was Beethoven's Trio in D major, for violin, viola, and violoncello, performed by Mr. Holmes, Mr. Ellis Roberts, and Mr. Pomeroy. The first two movements went well, but both the Minuet and the Rondo would have borne more rehearsal, there being a marked want of compactness throughout, and a visible effort to keep together. The last piece was Beethoven's Quartet in E flat (Op. 16), for pianoforte, violin, viola, and violoncello, which was delightfully played. The audience was perhaps slightly better than usual, but we would fain see the larger of the Victoria rooms crammed for these excellent Concerts, instead of the small room being only two-thirds full, as is now the case.

A large audience was present on the 8th ult. at Mr. Augustus Simmons's Concert, which took place in the Colston Hall. The performance of Haydn's "Stabat Mater"—said to be the first in England—was the chief attraction, and it was rendered by a choir and band of about 100 performers, the organ also being employed. It is practically an unknown work, and was composed in 1770. Haydn was seized with an illness which it was thought would prove fatal, and when prostrate he made a vow that if his life should be spared he would compose a "Stabat Mater" in honour of the Virgin Mary, as a token of thankfulness. On his recovery, therefore, he wrote this work, and dedicated it to the Electress of Saxony. It is a masterly composition, with a strong religious tone prevailing throughout, but there is not very much variety, especially in the earlier numbers. The principal vocalists were Miss Julia Jones, Miss Flora Edwards, Mr. Bernard Lane, and Mr. Montague Worlock. Mr. Theo. Carrington was the leader of the orchestra, and Mr. George Riseley was the organist, Mr. Simmons conducting. The second part of the programme was a miscellaneous selection of songs and instrumental solos, which were received with great cordiality by the audience. Mr. Dinelli Skelding was an efficient accompanist, and Mr. Simmons may be congratulated on the entire success of his undertaking.

On the 10th ult. Miss Madeleine Kelley gave a Concert in the smaller of the Victoria Rooms, Clifton, before a rather limited audience. She was assisted by Madame Evans-Warwick, Mr. Montague Shepherd, R.A.M., Mr. Mansfield, Mr. C. T. Grinfield, R.A.M., and Mr. A. W. Waite. The programme was miscellaneous, and not very interesting, and Mr. Waite's two violoncello solos elicited the warmest applause of the evening, being contributed in his well known artistic style.

Miss Farler's Grand Ballad Concert, which is an annual feature in the music of Bristol, took place on the 15th ult., on which occasion Colston Hall was crowded to excess, and certainly the vast audience had no reason to complain of the fare provided for them. With Madame Trebelli, Miss Carlotta Elliott, Mr. Henry Guy, and Mr. Maybrick as vocalists, and M. Vladimir de Pachmann, M. Hollman, and Signor Bisaccia as instrumentalists, a delightful evening might fairly be anticipated, and that this expectation was fully realised, the frequent enthusiastic applause testified. M. de Pachmann, who received quite an ovation on his appearance, chose as his solos a Nocturne by Chopin, Mendelssohn's Rondo and Capriccioso in E minor, a Prelude and Fugue by Raff, and Henselt's Romance and Study, "Si oiseau j'étais." The violoncello solos of M. Hollman received the heartiest applause, the breadth of tone he produces being quite marvellous. Miss Farler contributed two songs and met with a hearty reception, and certainly she deserves the warm thanks of the musical public for having brought together such a talented company of artists, and especially for giving us the opportunity of hearing M. de Pachmann in our own city.

The St. Martin's Choral Society gave an excellent performance of Barnby's Sacred Cantata "Rebekah" at the Assembly Rooms, Salisbury, on the 10th ult. The vocalists were Mrs. Steward, Mr. J. M. Hayden, and Mr. Crick of the Cathedral Choir. The work was performed with full band and chorus, and was conducted by Mr. Augustus Aylward. The March from Dr. Arnold's "Sennacherib" opened the Concert, and the second part of the programme included the Overtures to "Martha" (Flotow) and "Masaniello" (Auber), which were played with capital effect by the band.

The Plymouth Vocal Association gave Haydn's "Creation" in the Guildhall, Plymouth, on the 3rd ult., in a manner reflecting great credit on all concerned in its production. With Miss Robertson as soprano, Mr. Piercy as tenor, and Mr. Wills as bass, the solos received a most satisfactory interpretation. The choir, under the bâton of Mr. F. N. Löhr, the energetic honorary Conductor, sang extremely well, only marred in one or two places by a slight unsteadiness. Mr. Pardew as leader of the band, and Mr. Faull as Organist, gave most valuable service; and Mr. Löhr may feel gratified by the result of his careful training of band and chorus.

MUSIC IN EDINBURGH.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

The eighth Orchestral Concert of the Choral Union took place on January 25, too late for notice in our last number. The chief items in the programme were Brahms's "Academical" Overture, Beethoven's Symphony, No. 3 ("Eroica"), and Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto in E flat; selections from Mr. Cowen's "Sleeping Beauty," his Ballet Suite, "The Language of the Flowers," and a Fandango by Molique for violin. Mr. Carrodus met, as usual, with a hearty reception, and Madame Clara Samuell pleased her audience in her vocal selections.

On January 26 Herr Alfred Gallrein (violincellist) gave his third Chamber Concert in the Freemasons' Hall, assisted by Mr. Townsend (pianist), Mr. Colin Mackenzie (violin), and Mdle. Schow Rosing (vocalist). Mendelssohn's Trio in C minor opened the Concert, and was followed by the same composer's Sonata, for violoncello and piano, excellently rendered by both performers, and Chopin's Introduction and Polonaise in C. Herr Gallrein's solos were Handel's Largo and a Tarantelle by Popper, and Mr. Townsend played in an able manner selections from Rubinstein, Schumann, and Chopin. Mdle. Rosing gave songs by Schubert, Gounod-Bach, and Mozart.

On the same evening the St. Andrew's Amateur Orchestral Society gave a Concert in the Literary Institute Hall. The first and more ambitious part of the programme included three orchestral numbers—Mozart's Overture to "Figaro" and No. 9 Symphony, and a Gavotte ("Annette et Lubin") by Durand. The second part included an orchestral composition by Mr. Paton, the Conductor. Miss Macgregor, of this city, a talented young lady, contributing a violin solo ("Rêverie") by Vieuxtemps.

On the 1st ult. the Choral Union produced Dvorák's "Spectre's Bride," a novelty looked forward to with much interest from the great success it obtained at the recent Birmingham Festival. This remarkable composition, judging from the frequent applause, was duly appreciated; the singing of the chorus, however, showed the need of longer preparation and more rehearsing. Miss Thudichum ably sustained the soprano solos, Mr. Winch the tenor part, and Mr. John Hervet d'Egville (who unfortunately was suffering from a cold) the bass; Mr. Collinson conducted. This interesting work is to be produced again this season by Mr. Waddell's Choir. The second part of the Concert, under the bâton of Mr. Manns, consisted of Mozart's G minor Symphony and Beethoven's "Leonora" Overture, No. 3.

On the 8th ult. the Choral Union gave the last Concert for this season. Both pianist and vocalist—Mdle. Clotilde Kleeborg and Miss Dews—were new to Edinburgh audiences. The programme consisted of Mr. F. Corder's Overture "Prospero," Rossini's Overture to "William Tell," Schubert's Symphony in C (which received an admirable rendering), and Beethoven's E flat Piano-forte Concerto, in which Mdle. Kleeborg excelled. She subsequently gave an Etude by Chopin and selections from Mendelssohn and Handel. Miss Dews was successful in her singing of Gounod's "There is a green hill" and Hullah's "Three Fishers." At the end of this last Concert Mr. Manns received the usual farewell ovation.

On the 10th ult. the Edinburgh Amateur Orchestral Society gave the second Concert for the season in the Music Hall. The programme consisted of Cherubini's Overture "Faniska," Mendelssohn's "Calm sea," Lortzing's "Der Waffenschmied," a Concerto for violin and orchestra by De Beriot, the violin part being performed by Miss Macgregor, who also gave a solo by David; Haydn's Symphony in D major (No. 10), Louis Grehg's "Les noces d'or," and vocal contributions by Miss Maggie Summers and a gentleman. Mr. Carl Hamilton conducted in his usual satisfactory style.

The fifteenth Edinburgh Orchestral Festival, under the auspices of Sir Herbert Oakeley, the Professor of Music, began on the evening of the 12th ult. As usual, Mr. Charles Hallé and his orchestra were engaged, with Madame Norman-Néruda, Mdle. Trebelli, and Mr. Piercy. The novelties in this Concert were Dvorák's Piano-forte Concerto in G minor and Liszt's Rhapsody, No. 3. Beethoven's Eighth Symphony in F, Mendelssohn's Overture to "Midsummer Night's Dream," and that of Wagner to "Rienzi," with vocal contributions, completed the programme.

On the evening following, at the Reid Concert, the first number of the programme was the annually repeated "Introduction, Pastorale, Minuet, and March," composed by General Reid, and performed in honour of his memory. The rest of the programme, carefully chosen, contained the following orchestral numbers:—Beethoven's "Leonora" Overture, Mendelssohn's Scotch Symphony, Mozart's "Zauberflöte" Overture, and the "Rakoczy" March. Madame Norman-Néruda's contributions were Rodé's Seventh Violin Concerto in A minor; and solos, Beethoven's "Romance" in G, and a Prelude of Bach, Mr. Hallé delighting the audience by his rendering of Raff's Suite, for piano-forte and orchestra. Mdle. Trebelli gave songs by Rossini and Gounod, and Mr. Piercy an Aria from "Oberon" and a Ballad, composed by Professor Sir Herbert Oakeley, entitled "'Tis not alone that thou art fair," which pleased so well that an encore was insisted upon, and a call made for the composer.

On the 15th ult. the third Concert in connection with the Reid Festival took place. The orchestral numbers comprised—Overtures: Gade's "Hamlet," Beethoven's "Coriolanus," and Rossini's "Semiramide"; Mozart's Symphony, entitled "Serenade," in D, and Dvorák's "Légendes," Nos. 6 and 7 (Op. 59). It is needless to say that Mr. Hallé's orchestra played throughout with that verve and breadth of tone for which it is so justly celebrated. Compositions for the violin by Wieniawski, and for the piano by Chopin, were the respective solos of Madame Néruda and Mr. Hallé. Mdle. Trebelli and Mr. Piercy gave songs by Verdi and Weber.

MUSIC IN GLASGOW AND THE WEST OF SCOTLAND.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

DURING the first half of last month, the Choral Union Concerts continued to furnish the principal pabulum of the citizens, whose devotion to the rich feasts set before them was maintained, let it be said; unflinchingly to the end. The attendance has been large throughout, but on two occasions—one the night of the performance of the selections of music voted for out of those heard previously during the season, Saturday, the 6th ult., and the other the repetition of Dvorák's "Spectre's Bride," on the 13th ult.—the large hall was crowded beyond its capacity.

The first performance of "The Spectre's Bride," to the two representations of which I have above alluded, took place on the 11th ult., in presence of a large attendance of subscribers. Miss Annie Marriott, Mr. W. Winch, and Mr. John Bridson were the soloists. The choir, who are so well trained by Mr. A. Macbeth, chorus director, were in excellent form, and attacked their work with vigour. Scarcely a point was missed, while the tone and finish were everything that could be wished for. That the orchestra were satisfactory in their execution of the picturesque accompaniments need hardly be said. The applause which greeted the conclusion of the Cantata—there was little or no opportunity for demonstration of approval during the course of the piece, from its almost unbroken continuity, and the rapidity of the action—was warm and hearty. At the second performance of the Cantata, two nights after, there was, as above referred to, an enormous audience, and the plaudits were both energetic and prolonged. Had the composer been present at these performances he would most certainly have been greatly gratified with the execution of his music, and its reception by our public. It will doubtless always command remembrance in our schemes.

At the close of this Concert, which was the concluding one of the series, Mr. Manns received quite an ovation. Few musicians who have ever come North have done more than Mr. Manns for the musical education of Glasgow, and within the space of seven years, since which he assumed the bâton at these Concerts, no one has ever done anything like so much as he in that direction; the good influence extending, moreover, far beyond our own neighbourhood, northwards and southwards. Mr. Manns's long and wide experience, and above all his catholicity of tastes, exactly suit our scheme. The orchestra has proved an all-round very good one, and as we see many of the same faces in it year after year, there is undoubtedly a large measure of continuing homogeneity in it.

Among the newer or fresher pieces of music performed at the Concerts not embraced in my last letter, may be mentioned Mr. F. Corder's Overture "Prospero," which was much admired; a Suite, "In summer time," by Mr. W. T. Hoeck, which was flatteringly received; a selection from Raff's No. 11 Symphony, in A minor, "Winter"; and selections from ballet airs, "Etienne Marcel" (Saint-Saëns).

The Glasgow Choral Union held its annual Conversation and Ball on the evening of the 16th ult. Mr. James Campbell, of Tullichewan, addressed a few words of congratulation to the ladies and gentlemen of the chorus on the success of the series of Concerts just closed, especially complimenting Mr. Manns on the able manner in which he had conducted the performances.

A Choral Society has been formed at Busby, near Glasgow, under the conductorship of Mr. Alexander Patterson. There are about sixty members, with a rather higher average than usual of musical ability. The first Concert of the Society took place on January 27, the programme comprising chiefly glees and part-songs.

The Rutherglen Choral Society gave the first of two Concerts for the season, in the Town Hall, on the same date, with Sullivan's "On Shore and Sea," and a number of part-songs, Mr. W. Macintyre conducting.

A Concert took place on the 8th ult. in Parkhead Parish Church, in connection with the "inauguration" of the new organ built in the Church by Messrs. J. and A. Mirlless, of this city. The instrument is a comprehensive and good one of its class. Mr. Robert Buchanan, Jun., organist and choirmaster of the church, played several solos, and the Choir sang, under his conductorship, some very good selections, including Gounod's "By Babylon's wave" and an excellently written anthem by Mr. Buchanan, "Teach me, O Lord."

On the 9th ult. the Choir of Caledonia Road U.P. Church gave a Concert in the church, consisting chiefly of Mr. T. M. Pattison's sacred Cantata "A Day with our Lord," Mr. J. M. Kerr conducted, and Mr. G. W. Hopper accompanied on the organ. Four organ solos by Handel, Smart, Lott, and Guilmant were played, but were somewhat oddly used as introduction, or intermezzi, to the Cantata.

There are two Musical Societies connected with the Glasgow University, the one Orchestral and the other Choral, neither of which can be said to be in a very satisfactory condition at the present time. At all events, not being able to come forward this season with a Concert of a sufficiently high character, pending efforts which are being made towards reorganisation and reconstitution, the members invited Herr Ritter, professor of the viola, to give a Recital of music on his instrument, and a programme was arranged accordingly, including some orchestral and vocal selections, the Concert duly taking place on the 12th ult., in the Bute Hall of the University. Professor Ritter's solos were, as usual, highly agreeable. One of them, a clever fantasia on Scottish Airs, was based on melodies more Gaelic than Scotch, and not well-known. Mozart's Quartet in G minor, for piano, violin, alto, and violoncello, was played by Mrs. (Professor) Young, Professor Ritter, and Messrs. V. and W. Zinkeisen; the lady being the able musical critic of the Glasgow Herald, and the two last-mentioned gentlemen being highly accomplished amateurs. The Orchestral Society would appear to be in rather a better way than the other, for the members were able to give creditable performances of one of Haydn's Symphonies and two smaller instrumental selections. The Choral Society contented itself with four part-songs. It is greatly to be desired that something should be done to place the Associations in a position worthy of their connection with the University. Mr. Montague Smith, Organist to the University, is their Conductor.

Mr. Max Pauer gave a Pianoforte Recital, on the 15th ult., in St. Andrew's North Hall. His playing, if more robust and vigorous than delicate and graceful, is yet of high promise. The Beethoven Sonata in E major (Op. 109) was deficient in expression and grace in the slow movement; but the prestissimo was played with fire.

The West of Scotland Choral Society, under Mr. H. A. Lambeth, is doing well, I hear, and is now studying Spohr's "Last Judgment."

New York, February 12, 1886.

PRIOR to the 5th inst., Gounod's "Mors et Vita" had been performed at St. Louis, Philadelphia, and Boston. On the afternoon of that date, and again on the evening of the 6th, New Yorkers had their first opportunity of enjoying the work, the performance being by the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn, under the direction of Mr. Theodore Thomas. The forces engaged in the interpretation were admirable, and the study having been ample, the reading lucid, and the spirit of the singers enthusiastic, the performance took rank with the finest choral work to be heard in this country. The choir numbered five hundred voices; the orchestra was Mr. Thomas's model band, augmented to meet all the requirements of the score; the soloists, Miss Emma Juch, Miss Helen Dudley Campbell, Mr. William Candidus, and Mr. Myron W. Whitney, all of the American Opera Company. Both performances were heard by fine audiences and the reception of the work, though not marked by boisterous enthusiasm, was nevertheless such as to indicate that a deep impression had been made. Brooklyn audiences in their attitude towards oratorio performances are more like English provincial than any audiences in America, except, perhaps, those of Boston, and were quickly brought under the influence of the work. Demonstrations of pleasure were but few in the first part, but in the second and third nearly every number received a tribute of applause.

Additions to the operatic list, since my letter of last month, have been "Orpheus," "Lohengrin," "Magic Flute," and "The Merry Wives of Windsor," by the American Opera Company; "Faust" and "Rienzi," by the Germans. The American enterprise, which is under the artistic direction of Mr. Thomas, furnishes food for much newspaper discussion, out of which it is difficult to form an opinion either of the merits of the enterprise as a factor in the musical culture of America or of its representations. Clear-minded and unbiased people have carried away equally mixed impressions from the performances. Viewed as the fruit of an effort which, in the nature of things, has been accompanied by all manner of embarrassments, the representations have challenged genuine admiration for the excellence of the musical ensembles. No individual in the company has yet filled a part so as to convey the impression of a mature, rounded, artistic impersonation. Ordinarily, when a part is moderately well acted it is poorly sung; when well sung it is poorly acted, and the finest movements have been weighed down by a spirit of amateurishness, which is a great clog on the fancy of the most willing spectator. What the influence of such a spirit is on a work like "Lohengrin," I leave the reader to imagine. I, for one, have been unable to perceive the first trace of poetry in the representations of the opera. The only feeling of satisfaction that I have been able to carry away has been inspired by the chorus, the orchestra, and the stage decorations. In Gluck's "Orpheus" the results have been better. The opera is merely a concert in costume and with decorations, and the two most capable women in the company, Madame Hastreiter and Miss Juch, were respectively Orpheus and Eurydice. The representative of Love was woefully incapable, but the good work of the chorus, orchestra, and the other characters succeeded in obliterating in a short time the unfortunate impression made by her. The second act, with its extreme simplicity, as given by Madame Hastreiter, chorus, and orchestra, has been the most profoundly dramatic achievement that the company has put to its credit. In the "Magic Flute" the collective elements have given pleasure, and, as in all the operas thus far, the scenery and dresses have been greatly admired, but a real success was not scored, and the opera has been temporarily withdrawn, as has also "The Taming of the Shrew." The active list is now confined to "Orpheus," "Lohengrin," and Nicolai's "Merry Wives of Windsor," of which a new English version was specially prepared for the company by Mr. H. E. Krehbiel. This opera has enabled Madame L'Allemande to appear to good advantage, and, on the whole, its representations have been the most satisfactory of any, with the exception of "Orpheus." It does not, like "Lohengrin," present a task beyond the horizon of the company's abilities and vocal equipment. "Lakmé" is now in preparation, and the management has resolved to have it followed by Rubinstein's "Nero," which has been pretty well advertised by the frequent performance of its ballet music at Mr. Thomas's Popular Concerts. The most interesting feature of recent activity at the Metropolitan Opera House was the production of "Rienzi," though the brilliant manner in which Gounod's "Faust" was mounted has caused admiring comment. Thus far "Rienzi" has been given three times, and the indications are that its popular success will be second only to that of Goldmark's "Queen of Sheba," the production of which, on a hitherto unparalleled scale of grandeur, was the happiest stroke of business made by the management since the house was opened. The majority of the musical reviewers for the newspaper press in the city are avowed Wagnerites, yet "Rienzi" has fared but ill at their hands. Its hollow noisiness and gaudy show has been generally condemned. The fact that the public of New York is like the public of any other city in the world, fond of a fine spectacle, and all the more pleased when the accompanying music causes no brain-racking, is a sufficient explanation of the success of "Rienzi." To the serious-minded in art, however, it will seem like a misfortune if the popular liking for "Rienzi" should crowd "Die Meistersinger" into the background. The latter work has been successful beyond the expectations of most of its admirers among musicians and critics. Representatives of these classes have come from Boston and other cities to witness the representations, and no discord has yet entered the general chorus of acclaim. Another youthful work of Wagner, the short Oratorio "The Holy Supper of the Apostles," was performed here at a Concert given by Arthur Claassen, a Conductor of German Singing Societies, on the last day of January. The performance was a lamentably poor one, but this appeared to cause comparatively little disappointment to the Wagnerites, who seem to be of the opinion that little, if any, honour has been done the manes of Wagner by the revival of works which are interesting only as early milestones in his career. The effect of the rivalry between the opera companies seems thus far only to have been stimulating upon the public. There has been no appreciable loss in patronage at the Metropolitan Opera House, yet the Academy of Music has contained a fine audience at each representation, and frequently has been crowded. Nor have Mr. Thomas's semi-weekly Orchestral Concerts seriously injured the business of the Philharmonic Symphony and Oratorio Societies. The most noticeable influence on them is for good, as their schemes have been more interesting this year than ever. The Oratorio Society is now preparing Wagner's "Parsifal" for its last Concert this season, having already performed Berlioz's "Messe des Morts" and "The Messiah." Last Saturday the Symphony Society, with the aid of the Oratorio Society, performed Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust," and it still has Beethoven's Ninth Symphony in prospect. Mr. Thomas's Popular Programmes have had little new in them during the last month; the only novelties that came to mind being a selection of eight pieces from Rubinstein's Ballet "The Vine," a "Consolation," by a local composer, Mr. Otto Flörsheim, previously performed at one of Mr. Van der Stucken's Sunday afternoon Concerts, and Dvorák's beautiful Notturmo, Op. 40. Mr. Van der Stucken has resumed his Novelty Concerts, and at the first, on February 2, brought out Friedrich Gernsheim's "Waldmeister's Brautfahrt" Overture; a Symphonic Poem entitled "Vitava" (the Moldan Rim), by B. Smetana; the prologue to Dudley Buck's setting of Scenes from Longfellow's "Golden Legend"; and Massenet's ancient Idyl "Narcissus," for which Mr. Van der Stucken wrote orchestral accompaniments.

Interesting bits of information concerning the remainder of the American musical season come from various sources. The German Opera Company will be reorganised, after the close of its Metropolitan season on March 6, for a tour of the country. The enterprise is under the management of a man of large experience, Mr. H. Grau, but the prospects are not cheering. The Director of the Metropolitan gave his consent only grudgingly, and has disclaimed all interest in the tour, which he naturally fears will, if disastrous, react on the local enterprise. Herr Seidl and Mr. Damrosch will not join the party, nor will Fräulein Lehmann or Herr Stritt. The company will thus be sadly crippled, and to make matters worse the Director has refused to yield the use of the Metropolitan scenery and properties. To equip such a company fully and carry it across the continent is a task of the most tremendous proportions. Fräulein Lehmann will remain in America till May, having arranged a Concert trip to extend as far as San Francisco with Mr. Franz Rummel, who came here recently after his last series of Concerts in Great Britain. Fräulein Lehmann has also been engaged as principal soprano of the Musical Festival to be held in Cincinnati in May, under the direction of Mr. Thomas. The preliminary announcements for this Festival are out. The principal choral works to be performed are Bach's B minor Mass, Rubinstein's "Tower of Babel," Haydn's "Creation," Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust," and the third act of "Die Meistersinger." Preparations are progressing in Milwaukee for the German Festival to be given there in July, and a number of the German Opera soloists, besides Miss Juch, of the American Opera, have accepted engagements. The principal artistic interest at this Festival centres in the performance of the Cantata entitled "Columbus," composed by Herr Brambach, of Bonn, in competition for a prize of 1,000 dollars offered by the Festival Association. Mr. Gericke has been so successful in training his Boston orchestra that he contemplates bringing them to New York, to give the Metropolis a taste of Boston Music.

(FROM A CORRESPONDENT.)

If we are not musical already we are in a fair way to become so. The past year has, thanks to the efforts of Sir William Robinson and the generosity of Sir Thomas Elder and other gentlemen, seen the founding of the first Chair of Music in an Australian Colony, and Mr. J. Ives has the honour to be the first Professor of Music. Forty-two students have, by their attendance, testified to the success of the movement here, and sixteen candidates passed the first examination for the degree of Mus. Bac., out of a total of eighteen who sat at the examination. Melbourne intends to follow the lead of Adelaide, and establish another Chair at her own University.

We have also had a sixth season of the Adelaide Quartet Club, during which compositions by Haydn, Mozart, Schubert, and Beethoven have been performed.

A new Philharmonic Society, consisting of thirty-eight instrumentalists and one hundred and fifty voices, has been inaugurated under the conductorship of Professor Ives. Crowded houses and warm applause fully prove its success and augur its future prosperity.

Thirty-seven Organ Recitals have been given by the City Organist. The programmes have comprised Sonatas by Mendelssohn, Merkel, Fink, Rheinberger, and Lemmens; Concertos and Fugues by Bach, Handel, Wesley, and compositions by other sterling composers. The success of these Recitals has been so great that the organ is to be improved by the addition of a fourth manual and twenty new stops.

We have only one drawback: our newspaper critics are deficient in knowledge. At least, we have the right to think so when of our Cathedral service it is said that the Magnificat was well sung at the morning service; that the solo "He was despised" was beautifully rendered by the Choir; and that at the evening service the anthem was Goss's "Cantate O Deus." And if this does not suffice to show their weakness, the South Australian Register's notice of one of the Quartet Concerts may. A Mozart Quartet was followed by Schubert's "Trout" Quintet. The report ran—"After the heavy and somewhat laboured strains of Mozart, it was a pleasure to listen to the light, fairy-like music of Schubert's Quintet. The work is written much after the style of the modern light operas and contains beautiful harmony and counterpoint."

THE FLORENTINE TRIO.

THERE are few places in Italy where the cultivation of classical music is so neglected as it is in Florence. At first sight, this would seem the more strange, as in other branches of art the fair Tuscan city still holds her own; but on closer inspection, this decline of classical music, indeed of good music generally, is easily accounted for. Compared with the progressiveness and earnestness of musical culture in Milan, Turin, and even Bologna, the Florentine in his taste for music is essentially frivolous, and to have to listen to purely instrumental music, for however short a time, is to him positively a bore and a punishment. Another circumstance which accounts for the scanty patronage accorded to classical music, is the multiplicity of theatrical, both dramatic and operatic, entertainments; for it is not in the nature of things that a moderately-sized city like Florence, whose native population, as a whole, certainly cannot be said to be rolling in wealth, should be able to support something like ten theatres, all open at the same time, and besides that a number of high-class Concerts, not to mention others given by more or less obscure, lyrical, and instrumental artists of both indigenous and exotic origin, whose ambition frequently exceeds, alas, their proficiency.

Hence it is that the Cherubini Choral Society, a most deserving institution, ably conducted by Signor Buonamici, languished and died; that the Società Orchestrale which, under the distinguished direction of Signor Sbolci, always gave a regular series of grand orchestral Concerts during the winter season, now limits itself to two performances only; and that the Florentine Trio, the offspring or successor of the famous Florentine Quartet, now only gives one set of Concerts instead of two, as formerly. In point of excellence, however, these Concerts of the Florentine Trio, which is composed of Signori Buonamici, Chiostrì, and Sbolci, and their coadjutors, are second to none on the Continent, and stand out in bright contrast to the dearth of similar performances in Italy. Signor Buonamici, a distinguished pupil of Bülow, has long since established his undisputed supremacy in Florence as a pianist, and Signor Sbolci holds the same position as violoncellist; whilst Signor Chiostrì is a well-known member of the old stock, namely, of the old Florentine Quartet of European reputation. It is characteristic of these excellent artists that they confine their combined efforts almost entirely to the local sphere of Florence, where they are also the leading masters in their respective specialties: indeed this modesty, one might almost say want of ambition on their part, is to be regretted in the interest of art, for their names would gain in lustre in the wider atmosphere of London, where other Florentine artists, such as Signor Carlo Ducci the eminent pianist, and Signor Vannuccini the well-known singing-master, have not failed to win their laurels and to establish themselves permanently in the favour of an appreciative public.

The programme of each of the four Concerts consisted of compositions whose intrinsic and classical merits are too well known to require any special mention here. Suffice it to say that the first "Matinata" comprised Cherubini's stringed Quartet in C flat major, No. 1; Beethoven's Sonata for piano and violoncello in F major; and Mendelssohn's stringed Octet; the second Concert, Verdi's stringed Quartet in C minor; Beethoven's fifth Sonata for violin and piano in F major; and Schubert's Trio for piano, violin, and violoncello in B major (Op. 99); the third Concert, Haydn's stringed Quartet in E major; Saint-Saëns's Suite for piano and violoncello (Op. 16); and Schumann's Quartet for piano and stringed instruments in E flat major (Op. 47); and the fourth and last Concert, Volkmann's Trio for piano, violin, and violoncello in G flat minor (Op. 5); David Porpora's Sonata for violin and piano in E major; and Beethoven's Trio for piano, violin, and violoncello in E flat major (Op. 70, No. 2).

I need hardly point out that, in classical variety, this list is such as to satisfy the most fastidious. It gives eloquent proof, not only of the great versatility, but of the excellent taste of the eminent artists who selected those compositions, and executed them before crowded and enthusiastic audiences, with all that grace and refinement which are worthy of the best traditions of Italian art. "In art," says Goethe, "there is no mediocrity"; an utterance which the Florentine Trio has evidently laid to heart, and with the deep truth of which every lover of music, and every artist worthy of that name, should be imbued.

"MORS ET VITA" IN BELGIUM.

GOUNOD's Sacred TrilogY was produced—for the first time on the Continent—by the Nouvelle Société de Musique of Brussels, on January 30, the occasion being rendered specially memorable by the fact of the composer himself conducting the work. Chorus and Orchestra numbered some five hundred executants, the solo parts having been assigned to Mdlle. Elly Warnots (soprano), Madame Schnitzler-Selb (contralto), M. Heuschling (baritone), and Mr. Edward Lloyd, who has made the tenor part his own since he interpreted it with so much success at the Birmingham performance of the TrilogY. Under these auspices a worthy rendering of Gounod's noble Oratorio was assured beforehand, and there appears to be but one opinion as to the deep impression its performance has produced upon the audience. "It is a long time since the Société de Musique has presented us with so fine an ensemble of choristers and soloists," the Guide Musical of Brussels remarks, in a thoughtful and generally laudatory article, anent the event in question, from the pen of M. Kufferath. And referring to the soloists more especially, the same journal observes: "Amongst the solo vocalists, the most favourable impression was made by Mr. Lloyd, the English tenor, whose voice, absolutely sure of intonation and equal in all its registers, is truly remarkable, while his delivery is clear without being forced, expressive without exaggeration, correct without being frigid." Concerning the merits of the work itself, L'Indépendance Belge, of the 2nd ult., contains a very appreciative article, from which we may cite the following passages: "A leading characteristic, and one which applies to every portion of 'Mors et Vita,' is to be found in the fact of the musical colouring always marvellously corresponding with the nature of the images presented by the sacred text. . . . In order to attain this end, it is necessary that the vocal parts and the orchestral combinations should be in exact conformity with the meaning of the words, whatever the subject treated, be it dramatic or religious, human or celestial. It is in this direction where the author of 'Mors et Vita' excels more than any other composer of our time." The writer of the article referred to has, however, most of his admiration to bestow upon the "Dies Iræ," which he considers "one of the most remarkable portions of a work containing so much that is excellent. Here voices and orchestra combine to express with an astonishing truthfulness of utterance, the stupor of the soul and the agony of the troubled spirit." More passages equally eulogistic might be extracted, but sufficient has already been quoted to show the high appreciation which is being accorded to M. Gounod's chef-d'œuvre on the part of our Belgian neighbours. It is scarcely necessary to add that the composer was most enthusiastically received, and, at the conclusion of the performance, became the object of a perfect ovation.

On the 10th ult., M. Gounod also conducted the "Trilogy" at Antwerp, where the "Association des Artistes Musiciens" had for some time past been preparing the work. The success here was again a brilliant one, so brilliant, indeed, that a second performance had to be given on the following Sunday before an audience quite as numerous as on the preceding occasion. Both performances are described as excellent ones, the choruses having been, it is said, even more finely rendered than at Brussels. The solos were in the hands of Mdlle. Flament, Madame Schnitzler-Selb, MM. Warot and Séguin. In summing up his impression of the work after being present at the Antwerp performance, a Belgian critic says: "'Mors et Vita' presents the threefold advantage of being at once classical as regards its forms, novel in the adaptation of these forms to the individuality of its composer, and novel also as regards its harmonic texture, which abounds in ingenuity and happy inspiration."

THE SEVENTH ANNUAL DINNER of the South London Musical Club took place at the Holborn Restaurant, on Saturday, the 6th ult. The chair was occupied by Sir George Grove, D.C.L., Principal of the Royal College of Music, and amongst the visitors present were Dr. Stainer, Mr. Henry Gadsby, Dr. C. J. Frost, Mr. Stokoe, &c. Nearly 200 members of the Club and their friends sat down to dinner, the attendance being larger than on any previous occasion. Mr. Charles Stevens, the Musical Director of the Club, in proposing the health of the Chairman, said they were all very proud to see Sir George Grove in the chair that evening. The majority of those present were no doubt familiar with his literary work generally, but more especially perhaps with those excellent analytical remarks in the programmes of the Crystal Palace Saturday Concerts signed "G." which had done so much to familiarise the public with the works of the great masters. Sir George Grove, in reply, said that he was very glad to preside over an assembly of amateurs. He was himself a typical amateur. He had never received a musical education, but was brought up as an engineer. He then became Secretary to the Crystal Palace Company, and it was at that supremely happy time of his life that he began to write those remarks which had been alluded to so favourably by Mr. Stevens. In writing them he had endeavoured to acquaint other amateurs, searching out for themselves the secrets of the great masterpieces of music, with the impressions and the ideas they conveyed to him, and he was glad to feel that they had been of use to many. His principal duty, however, that evening was to propose the toast of the South London Musical Club, which he did with peculiar pleasure, because these great singing clubs represented to him the strong, sturdy British resistance which the country had made during the present century to foreign innovations. The introduction of foreign schools of music, which had been taken up by society and fashion, had pushed English music on one side, but the old Glee Societies and Clubs, like the South London Musical Club, exhibited the persistence of Englishmen in endeavouring to maintain an English School of Music. The great glee literature of England was a literature which, in many respects, the country should be proud of. It was very different from any other form of music existing abroad during the last century, and was the direct descendant of the contrapuntal style which obtained in old English Cathedral music. Societies like this exhibited also the pleasure many people took in the practice of the most delightful of arts, whose ordinary avocations were probably quite removed from art of any kind. He hoped the South London

Musical Club would continue to flourish. Mr. C. W. F. Welchman, the President of the Club, then gave a short history of its existence, and said that the affairs of the Club were in a most satisfactory condition. Eight Smoking Concerts and three Evening Concerts were given each year, and at the latter it was customary to engage a vocalist and an instrumentalist, preferably young and promising artists. It was proposed, during the present year, to offer a prize for a composition for men's voices, probably for two tenors and two basses, as the Club had recently obtained great success in performance of such works as Mr. Henry Gadsby's "Columbus" and Mrs. Meadows White's "Song of the Little Baltung." Mr. Percy Davies proposed the Visitors, in a humorous speech, to which Dr. Stainer replied. As to the good (he said) which Societies of this kind did, it always struck him as a remarkable thing, especially in our great Choral Societies, that people should submit themselves to be lectured by a conductor for the sake of music. With respect to the Chairman, he had known Sir George Grove for about twenty years now, and it was at his invitation he had made his re-entry into London at a Crystal Palace Saturday Concert, where for the first time an organ solo was introduced. He (Dr. Stainer) would like to say a word on the vexed question of amateurs. Professional musicians owe a great debt of gratitude to amateurs, and he had himself recently refused to join a Society which had for its main object the drawing of a straight line between the professional and the amateur. He never wanted to see that straight line drawn. They (the South London Musical Club) had a very talented amateur as their Conductor in Mr. Charles Stevens, who, while being an amateur, had the experience and knowledge of a professional. Dr. Stainer concluded by wishing the Club the greatest possible success. Mr. Henry Gadsby also said a few words, and, on the retirement of Sir George Grove, took the chair for the remainder of the evening. The programme included a selection of glees and part-songs by the Choir.

THE FIRST DEGREES of Doctor of Music at the University of London, have just been conferred on Mr. Wm. Henry Hunt, of Birkenhead, and Mr. Augustus H. Walker, of Brighton, after strict examinations by the Musical Examiners of the University, Dr. John Stainer, M.A., and Dr. William Pole, F.R.S. This University retains, like Oxford, the condition of a public production of the Doctors' exercises, and the two works, namely, a "Stabat Mater" by Mr. Hunt, and a "Requiem" by Mr. Walker, were accordingly performed in the theatre of the University on Saturday afternoon, the 20th ult., before the Vice-Chancellor and officers and a fairly numerous audience. The compositions were for eight voices and full orchestra, and were, we understand, of high character. There was a goodly array of singers, soli and chorus, and the orchestral accompaniments were effectively arranged for pianoforte (four hands) and harmonium. The composers conducted, and the performance was very creditable.

THE FOLLOWING are the dates and particulars of the Examinations at the University of Oxford: 1. For the Degree of Doctor in Music, on Wednesday, October 13, 1886; 2. Second Examination for the Degree of Bachelor in Music, on Wednesday, October 13, 1886. In addition to the usual subjects, there will be required a critical knowledge of "Der Freischütz" (Weber), Symphony, No. 5 (Beethoven). All exercises are to be sent to the Professor of Music, Sir Frederick A. Gore Ouseley, St. Michael's, Tenbury, as early as possible. None can be received after the end of June.

THE TIMES of the 18th ult. says: "We are requested to state that Franz Liszt, during his forthcoming visit to England, can entertain no proposal for playing in public. He writes: 'I wish it to be understood that I come to London merely as a guest; my fingers are seventy-five years old, and Bülow, Saint-Saëns, Rubinstein, and Walter Bache play my compositions much better than my dilapidated self.'"

A PRESENTATION of a handsome marble clock and pair of vases was recently made to Mr. George Adcock, in recognition of the great services he has rendered to the cause of music in Loughborough for many years past.

THE members of the St. George's Glee Union gave their 204th Consecutive Monthly Concert on the 5th ult., at the Pimlico Rooms, Warwick Street. The first part of the programme was miscellaneous, songs being contributed by Miss Maud Leslie, Miss Blanche Murray, Mr. Charles Strong, and Mr. Theodore Distin. The choir, under Mr. Monday's direction, sang with good expression "Come, see what pleasure," James Elliott; "Gipsy Life" (Op. 29), Schumann; "In the lonely vale of streams," Calcott; and "When winds breathe soft," S. Webbe. The comic Cantata "John Gilpin," by George Fox, occupied the second part. The solos were well rendered by Miss Distin (in place of Miss Maud Cameron, absent through indisposition), Miss Blanche Murray, Mr. Charles Strong, and Mr. Theodore Distin. The choruses were well sung. Mr. F. R. Kinkeedy ably presided at the pianoforte.

THE Finsbury Choral Association gave the second of its winter series of Concerts on the 18th ult., at Holloway Hall. The works selected were Dr. Stainer's "St. Mary Magdalen" and Barnett's "Ancient Mariner," and both were rendered by the choir, numbering upwards of 200 voices, in an extremely creditable style. The solos were taken by Miss Bertha Moore, Miss Alice Heale, Mr. Kenningham, and Mr. Forington; and Dr. Stainer and Mr. J. F. Barnett conducted their respective works. The audience was large and enthusiastic, the Solo and Chorus in "St. Mary Magdalen," "He is not here," and the Quartet, "Around, around, few each sweet sound" ("Ancient Mariner"), evoking much applause. Mr. J. P. Harding and Mr. F. J. Marchmont presided at the pianoforte and harmonium respectively. The Concert concluded with Mendelssohn's Eight-part Psalm, "Judge me, O God."

THE second Concert of the Gravesend and Milton Choral Association, took place on Tuesday, the 16th ult., and proved highly successful. The programme was miscellaneous. Mr. J. T. Carrodus gave four solos on the violin, and his brilliant playing fairly entranced the audience. The vocalists were Miss Kate Drew, Miss Hope Glenn, Mr. T. W. Page, and Mr. Watkin Mills, all of whom were highly successful, many of the songs being encored. Mr. Howard Moss shared the duties of accompanist with Mr. J. Carrodus, Jun., and gave as a pianoforte solo, Bourrée, Op. 160 (Silas), in such excellent style that he was compelled to accept an encore. The members of the chorus contributed Prout's "Hail to the chief," Caldicott's humorous glee "Jack and Jill," and Gladstone's "A wet sheet and a flowing sea," with great precision and effect, under the direction of Mr. C. K. Green, the Conductor.

THE Organ Recital of Saturday, the 20th ult., at the Bow and Bromley Institute, was one of special interest, and was given before an audience which filled the room to overflowing. The organist was Mr. E. H. Lemare, F.C.O., who played organ music by Bach, Smart, Morandi, Guilmant, E. H. Turpin, and Salomé, with great effect, at once claiming the good opinion and hearty applause of his audience. Mr. G. A. Osborne's Duo for pianoforte and organ, arranged from his Sestet, was finely played by the composer as pianist, upon an instrument kindly and expressly lent by Messrs. Broadwood, Mr. E. H. Turpin taking the organ part. The work greatly pleased a critical audience, the composer being enthusiastically recalled. Miss Kate Flinn sang several solos effectively, Mr. Viotti Collins was the solo violinist, and Mr. Fountain Meen played the accompaniments.

MISS JANET ST. CLAIR gave an evening Concert in the Brixton Hall, on Tuesday, the 16th ult. The soloists were, in addition to the Concert-giver, who was very successful in her rendering of Braga's Serenade (violin obligato, Mr. S. O. Parrott), Miss Josephine Turner, Madame Antoinette Sterling, whose chief effort was Sullivan's "Lost Chord" (Organ obligato, Mr. H. Tonking), Mr. James Budd, Mr. J. Dalgety Henderson, and Mr. Donnell Balfie. Mr. S. O. Parrott's playing of De Beriot's violin solo "Scène de ballet" was highly meritorious, and Miss Elen Edridge gave an excellent rendering of two pianoforte solos, and also accompanied several numbers. Mr. C. S. Macpherson (pianoforte), Mr. H. C. Tonking (organ), and Mr. H. W. Austin (clarinet) were efficient in their respective solos. The Concert was well attended.

MR. A. BUHL (Principal of the Mendelssohn Academy of Pianoforte Music, Clarendon Road, Holland Park) gave three classical Concerts in aid of the poor of the parishes of St. Peter's, St. James's, and St. Mark's, Notting Hill, at the above institution, on January 27, 28, and 29. The programmes, from the works of Beethoven, Mozart, Mendelssohn, Schumann, Schubert, Buhl, Gollmick, &c., were excellently rendered and highly appreciated by critical audiences. Mr. A. Buhl as solo pianist, and Miss Adeline Dinelli as solo violinist, fully sustained their reputations. Miss E. Butterworth and Fraülein F. Gollmick gave finished interpretations of duets by Schubert and Schumann, and Miss Annie Mallows and Mr. Henry Prenton, the solo vocalists, were well received. Mr. Giuseppe Dinelli and Mr. Victor Gollmick officiated as accompanists.

THE Gloucester Musical Festival is arranged to take place on September 7, 8, 9, and 10. The programme will include "Elijah," Bach's "Passion" (St. Matthew), "Mors et Vita" (Gounod), "A Song of Victory" (Hiller), "God is gone up" (Gibbons), "Hymn of Praise" (Mendelssohn), and "The Messiah." The novelties will be an Orchestral piece by Dr. Hubert Parry, a secular Cantata, "Andromeda," by Mr. Harford Lloyd, and a sacred Cantata, "The Good Shepherd," by Mr. W. S. Rockstro. The music committee has concluded engagements with the following artists:—Madame Albani, Miss Anna Williams, Madame Patey, Miss Hilda Wilson, Mr. Edward Lloyd, Mr. Winch, Mr. Santley, and Mr. Watkin Mills. Mr. Done and Dr. Colborne will preside at the pianoforte and organ respectively, and Mr. C. L. Williams will be the Conductor.

MR. ISIDORE DE LARA gave the first of a series of three Vocal Recitals at the Steinway Hall, on Tuesday afternoon, the 16th ult. In addition to several ballads from his own pen, which scarcely need notice in this place, his programme included Sir Arthur Sullivan's composition "The Window; or, Songs of the Wrens," written some sixteen years ago to poems supplied by Tennyson, but never before performed in public. It is impossible to say anything in favour of the verses; except to indiscriminating admirers of the Poet Laureate they must appear puerile and devoid of meaning. But they have provided a vehicle for the utterance of some of our accomplished native composer's most graceful and charming ideas. In musicianly structure and fancy the songs are far superior to ordinary ballads; and were it not for the supremely silly words, they would doubtless be frequently heard at high class concerts.

MR. FREDERICK BEVAN gave a very successful Concert at Brixton Hall, on Monday evening, the 15th ult. The bénéficiaire's solos comprised Gounod's "Maid of Athens," Hattori's "To Anthea," and "The Vicar's Song," from Sullivan's "Sorcerer," in each of which Mr. Bevan obtained warm applause. A song composed by the Concert-giver, entitled "The Fisher-wife's Vigil," was excellently sung by Madame Patey. The other vocalists were Miss Agnes Larkcom, whose singing of Bishop's "Lo, here the gentle lark" (flute obligato, Mr. W. L. Barrett) merited special mention, Miss Ethel Winn, Mr. Harper Kearton, Mr. Sidney Tower, and Mr. Robert Hilton; Miss Anna Lang (violin), and Signor Tito Mattei (pianoforte). The St. Paul's (Brixton) Choral Society sang part-songs, under the conductorship of Mr. W. Sexton, and Mr. Turle Lee accompanied.

AT the first Examination for the degree of Mus. Bac. at the University of Oxford, the following satisfied the Examiners:—Bryan, E. V. E., Non-Coll., and of Lingfield, Surrey; Keller, F., New College, and of Ryder Street, St. James's, London; Lawrence, H. M., Non-Coll., and Leeds; Lillingston, S. E. L., Hertford College; Lubbock, C. W., Balliol College, and Salcombe Regis, Sidmouth; Sherwell, F. H., New College, and of Brislington, Bristol; Simpson, F. J., New College, and of Portobello, Midlothian; Stamps, F. W., Queen's College, and of West Bromwich; Trueman, H. J., Christ Church, and of Jesus Lane, Cambridge. Examiners: Sir F. A. Gore Ouseley, Bart., D. Mus., M.A., Christ Church, Professor; C. H. H. Parry, D. Mus., M.A., Exeter, Choragus; J. Varley Roberts, D. Mus., Magdalen College.

AN Evening Concert was given on the 18th ult. at Princes' Hall, by Miss Eugenie Sturfels, an accomplished young pianist, who was assisted by Mr. Josef Ludwig (violin) and Mr. Whitehouse (violoncello); Miss Amy Sherwin being the vocalist. Miss Sturfels, after presiding very efficiently at her instrument in Haydn's Pianoforte Trio in C major, gave a very thoughtful and brilliant reading of Schumann's Sonata in G minor, for which she gained well-deserved applause. The lady also contributed pieces by Scarlatti, Chopin, and Nicodé, and was moreover associated with Mr. Ludwig in a capital rendering of Dvorák's interesting Sonata in F major for pianoforte and violin. Mr. Whitehouse played with admirable tone and perfect technique a "Czardas" by Fischer. The hall was well filled with a highly appreciative audience.

THE Crouch End Choral Society gave its second Concert of the twelfth season, at Christ Church School-room, Crouch End, on Tuesday, the 2nd ult., when Thomas Anderton's Cantata "Yule Tide" was performed. The choral numbers were rendered in a satisfactory manner, and the solos were sung by Miss Alice Parry, R.A.M., Miss Alice Long, Mr. George Micklewood, and Mr. Frank Ward, each of whom did full justice to the music. The second part consisted of Birch's Operetta "The Merrie Men of Sherwood Forest." Mr. C. W. Lovejoy presided at the pianoforte. A professional string quintet, under the able leadership of Mr. Zerbini, gave additional interest to the accompaniments. Mr. Alfred J. Dye, A.Mus., conducted as usual. The "Rose of Sharon" is announced for the third Concert in May.

THE members of the Upper Holloway Choral Society, conducted by Mr. E. Davidson Palmer, Mus. Bac., Oxon, gave their first Concert on January 28, in the Lecture Hall of Upper Holloway Baptist Chapel. The principal item in the programme was Schubert's "Song of Miriam," the soprano solo in which was sustained by Miss Edith Palmer. Miss Ballantyne accompanied on the pianoforte, and Mr. Edwin Drewett, A.C.O., on the harmonium. The second part of the Concert was miscellaneous. Miss Palmer, Miss Agnes Wilson, Miss Edith M. Stephens, and Mr. James Blackney were the solo vocalists. A clarinet solo was played by Mr. A. W. Seager, and two violin solos by Miss Charlotte A. Wilkes were executed with such skill and artistic finish as to elicit the most hearty applause.

THE Dedication Festival at St. Agnes', Kennington Park, began on January 20. On the Sunday in the Octave, at the 11 o'clock service, Weber's Mass in G was sung, Miss E. Howes, Messrs. H. Green, J. Wint, and Plant being the soloists. On Monday, the 25th (the Conversion of St. Paul), a selection from Mendelssohn's "St. Paul" was given, under Mr. W. W. Hedgcock's direction, at a special service in the evening. The solos were taken by Madame Worrell, Miss A. Gatland, Signor Rizzelli, and Mr. Stanley Smith; Mr. Hedgcock being at the organ. The choruses were sung by the church choir. On Wednesday the Festival was brought to a close by the singing, before the altar, of Smart's Te Deum in F. Weber's Mass was repeated on Sunday, January 31.

THE Woodside Park Musical Society commenced its first season with a performance of Sir Sterndale Bennett's "Woman of Samaria" and Wilfred Bendall's Cantata "Parizadeh," on Thursday, the 4th ult., at Woodside Hall, North Finchley. This room, which has been recently built, is specially adapted for Concert purposes, its acoustical properties being very good. The solo vocalists were Miss Kate Drew, Madame Florence Winn, Mr. Reginald Groome, and Mr. Sidney Beckley. Mrs. G. J. Williams presided at the pianoforte and Mr. J. G. Calcott at the harmonium, the professional string quintet being led by Mr. Zerbini. Mr. Alfred J. Dye, A.Mus. (who has been appointed Conductor of the Society), directed the performance.

IT is with much regret that we record the death of Mr. Ricardo Linter, which occurred at his residence in Cheltenham on the 6th ult. Mr. Linter was the composer of numerous light pieces for the pianoforte, upon which instrument he was an accomplished performer. He also held an excellent position as a teacher, and was highly respected in the profession.

A CORDIAL welcome must be accorded to the new series of the Musical World, under the editorship of Mr. Hueffer, which appeared in an enlarged form, and at a reduced price, on the 2nd of January last. This weekly periodical, the oldest of all existing musical journals, having been established by Mr. J. A. Novello in 1836, has been contributed to by most of the ablest writers on the art, and forms a valuable record of all the principal musical events for many years back. It remained under the editorship of Mr. J. W. Davison until his decease; and now appeals to us with an increase of vigour in its pages which augurs well for its future. The new monthly musical journal, issued by Messrs. W. Morley and Co., entitled Musical Society, is announced to appear on the first of the present month, the contents including contributions by Mrs. Diehl, Mr. Walter Macfaren, Mr. Carl Mangold, and Mr. W. H. Cummings. Each number will contain a vocal composition, with reviews, criticisms of Concerts, the Drama, &c. It need scarcely be said that we wish every success to what promises to be an earnest worker in the cause we have at heart.

We are glad to learn that Mr. Cowen's Cantata "Sleeping Beauty" is to be performed at a Concert of the Concordia Society, in Paris, on the 4th inst., the French version of the libretto having been undertaken by Mlle. Augusta Holmes. The short time elapsing between the production of this work at the Birmingham Festival and its presentation in the French capital is a proof that success in England is now promptly recognised even in a country where, until lately, not a note of English music had been heard. The same composer's "Language of the Flowers" is also announced for performance at one of Colonne's Concerts in Paris.

NINETEEN open Free Scholarships out of the fifty in the Royal College of Music become vacant at Easter, the Council having determined to prolong the time of the remainder for a year on the ground of merit. This fact has been notified to the municipal authorities of the United Kingdom, and 169 centres of examination have been appointed. We understand that 655 candidates have registered their names. These will be sifted by the Honorary Examiners in the localities, and those who pass will go up to the College for the final competition before the Director and Board of Professors on the 18th inst. and following days.

A MUSICAL Festival, on a large scale, has been arranged to be held in Toronto about the middle of June next. The works selected for performance are Handel's "Israel in Egypt" and Gounod's "Mors et Vita," in addition to which there will be a miscellaneous Concert and a Children's Festival Concert. The choir will consist of at least 1,000 voices, and the orchestra will comprise the best available players in the United States, as well as local excutants. A guarantee fund of over 5,000 dollars has been raised to insure against loss. The rehearsals are now being carried on weekly, under the able conductorship of Mr. F. H. Torrington.

A CONCERT of the Bach Choir, under the conductorship of Mr. C. Villiers Stanford, will take place at St. James's Hall, on Thursday evening, the 25th inst. The programme will consist of the following works not hitherto performed at the Society's Concerts: "Gott ist mein König," Cantata for solo voices, choir, and orchestra (J. S. Bach); Hungarian Concerto (Joachim), for violin and orchestra, to be played by the composer; "Elegischer Gesang," for choir and orchestra (Beethoven); and the third part of Schumann's music to Goethe's "Faust," for solo voices, choir, and orchestra.

THE members of The Grosvenor Choral Society, gave a successful rendering of Prout's Cantata "Hereward," at their 168th Monthly Concert, held at the Grosvenor Hall, Buckingham Palace Road, on the 19th ult. The choruses, especially those for male voices, were well rendered. The soloists were Madame Merton Clark (in the absence through indisposition of Miss Maud Cameron), Mrs. Luff, Mrs. Woodhouse, Miss Bond, Mr. Iver McKay, Mr. Donnell Balfe, and Mr. A. Roach. Mrs. T. P. Frame presided at the pianoforte, and Mr. George Winney at the organ. Mr. David Woodhouse conducted.

THE concluding open monthly meeting of the session of the Society called "The Sette of Odd Volumes" was held on the 5th ult., at the Freemasons' Tavern. An interesting paper on Old Organ Music was read by Mr. Burnham Horner, containing a résumé of the work of the organists and composers of music for that instrument, principally in the last century, and dealing with the improvements of the organ from time to time, and the concurrent changes in the music adapted to its use. His Lecture was illustrated by Recitals from the compositions of Avison and Wesley on a chamber organ.

THE "Feast of Adonis" (Jensen) and the "May Queen" (Bennett), formed the chief part of the Concert programme of the Bedford Park Madrigal Society, given at the Club, Bedford Park, on Thursday, January 28. The solos were taken by Mrs. Mulliner, Miss Dumere, Messrs. H. Knott and A. J. Beck. In the second part Miss L. Hemery's playing of Ernst's "Elegie" (violin), and that of Mr. J. Field in Lachner's "Nocturne" (violinello), were deservedly appreciated. Mr. C. J. Viner conducted, and Mrs. Von Veith and Mr. E. L. Haywood (R.A.M.) were the accompanists.

A VERY successful Concert was given on Saturday, the 13th ult., in the Albert Lecture Hall, Peckham. The principals were Miss Katherine Jones, Miss Annie Buckland, Miss Maud Leslie, Mr. F. Walter Crawley, Mr. Eccles, Mr. W. T. Skinner, and Mr. James Murch; Miss Fuller (violin), Mr. Szalezewski and Mr. Ernest Miles (pianoforte). Several glee and part-songs were well rendered by a male-voice glee party. Miss Florence Shirley recited in an able manner "Curfew must not ring to-night." The Concert was under the direction of Mr. F. W. Crawley.

ON the 18th ult. the Choir of St. Mary's Parish Church, Balham, S.W., under the direction of Mr. H. W. Weston, A.C.O., gave the closing Weekly Concert of the season in the Parochial Schools. The room was crowded, and the Choir, among other things, sang Hatton's "Belfry Tower," Piusotti's "Spring Song," and Garrett's "Good night, farewell," in excellent style. Mr. Weston, who received an enthusiastic reception, played Raff's "L'Espiegle," and Mazurka (Op. 16, No. 2), by Scharwenka, the latter piece being encored.

A VERY successful performance of Haydn's "Creation" was given at the Highbury Athenæum, on Wednesday, January 27, in aid of the Choir Fund of St. Saviour's, Aberdeen Park. The chorus was composed of members of the Highbury Philharmonic and Crouch End Choral Societies, supplemented with a full orchestra. Miss Emily Buxton, R.A.M., Mr. Edwin Bryant, and Mr. Frank Ward gave a careful rendering of the solos. Mr. Fountain Meen presided at the pianoforte, and Mr. Alfred J. Dye, A.Mus., conducted.

THE Thirteenth Annual Festival of the London Church Choir Association, will be held at St. Paul's Cathedral, on Thursday evening, the 4th inst., when the sermon will be preached by the Bishop of London, and the offertory devoted (after payment of expenses) to the fund for the benefit of the widow and children of the late choirmaster, Mr. J. R. Murray. The anthem composed for the Association by Mr. A. R. Gaul will be sung, and the service conducted by Dr. Stainer, with Dr. Martin presiding at the organ.

THE North-East London Choral Society (Conductor, Mr. John E. West; accompanist, Mr. Louis B. Prout), gave an excellent Concert at St. Luke's Hall, Hackney, on the 1st ult., when Dr. J. F. Bridge's "Hymn to the Creator" and a miscellaneous selection were performed. A part-song, composed by John E. West, and a song, "The roseate hues," sung by Miss Lottie West, were well received by a large and appreciative audience. "Sing me to sleep" (Berthold Tours) was given by Madame Clara West, and unanimously redemanded.

MISS AGNES ZIMMERMANN will give a Pianoforte Recital at Princes' Hall, Piccadilly, early in March. The programme will include Beethoven's Sonata (Op. 101), Schumann's Fantasia in C (Op. 17), and selections from Bach, Rameau, Graun, Scarlatti, Chopin, Rubinstein, Moszkowski, &c.

THE ordinary monthly meeting of the North-East London Society of Musicians was held on Tuesday, the 16th ult., at the Grocers' Company's School, Hackney Downs, a Paper on Church Music being read by the Rev. E. T. Leach, M.A. The President (Mr. Ebenezer Prout) occupied the chair, and initiated the discussion that followed the reading of the paper, which was sustained by Mr. Arthur Trickett (Hon. Sec.), Mr. C. M. Gray, Mr. F. Bridge, Dr. Pringuer, Mr. C. E. Smith, Mr. Black, and Mr. Denham.

THE Annual Report of the Kyrle Society for 1885 announces that, in addition to much other useful work in consonance with the artistic object of the Association, the Choir has given several performances of the standard sacred musical compositions, the admissions to which have invariably been gratuitous. We sincerely hope that the appeal for funds to carry on this branch of the Society's efforts in the cause of popular education may meet with a liberal response.

THE Clapton Vocal Quartet (Messrs. A. W. Maycock, Henry Thom, S. C. Ratcliff, and Alex. H. S. Burnett) and friends held their first anniversary supper on Monday evening, the 1st ult., at the residence of one of the members. After supper the usual toasts were given and responded to with musical honours; and then an excellent selection of vocal and instrumental music was well rendered. Mr. W. M. Wait (Conductor and accompanist) presided at the pianoforte.

THE Kyrle Choir gave performances of "Elijah," on the 9th and 16th ult., in Whitefield's Tabernacle, Tottenham Court Road, and in Trinity Chapel, Poplar. At the first performance the soloists were: Miss Clara Hoschke, Mrs. Dean, Mr. Reginald Groome, and Mr. Albert Orme; at the second, Miss Clara Hoschke, Miss Jessie Dixon, Mr. Sinclair Dunn, and Mr. James Blackney. Mr. Stedman conducted, and Mr. E. H. Turpin accompanied on the organ.

MADAME A. H. WATKINS gave her fifth annual Concert in the Peckham Public Hall, on Monday, the 15th ult., when she was assisted by Madame Reichelman, Madame Lansdell-Sims, Miss Maud Cameron, Miss Clara Wilson, Messrs. Donnell Balfe, Wakefield Reed, L. J. Langmead, and Franklin Clive. Solo violin, Herr Polonaski; solo piano, Miss E. Hastings Warren. The audience was large, and the Concert successful.

ON the 15th ult., Miss Laura Willock read an able and valuable paper before the Educational Society at the Memorial Hall, Farringdon Street, on the Galin-Paris-Chevé (the French Tonic Sol-fa) system, in which she claimed special advantages in the use of numbered intervals both for class and harmony teaching. A discussion followed in which Mrs. Dr. Briant and others took part. Mr. E. H. Turpin presided over the meeting.

THE prospectus, for the fourth year, of the Stratford Musical Festival announces that a series of public Competitions will be held in the various branches of music at Stratford, in the month of May, on days to be hereafter named. The judges appointed are Messrs. W. H. Cummings, W. G. McNaught, and Ridley Prentice.

A CONVERSAZIONE was given in the Town Hall, Wandsworth, on Friday, the 5th ult., under the direction of Mr. Harry Dancy. The following artists appeared:—Miss Kate Fusselle, Miss Coyte Turner, and Mr. Frank May, vocalists; solo violin, Mr. H. C. Tonking; accompanist, Mr. Arthur E. Godfrey.

MR. EDWARD A. COOMES has been presented by the members of the Beckenham District Choral Association, with an elegant silver-mounted ivory bâton bearing an inscription, as a mark of their appreciation of his honorary services as Conductor.

A NATIONAL Temperance Fête, in connection with the United Kingdom Band of Hope Union, will take place at the Crystal Palace, on Tuesday, July 13. The adjudicator in the choir contest is Dr. Stainer.

SPOHR'S Sacred Cantata "The Christian's Prayer" was sung at the Festival Service at St. John's Chapel, New York, on the 7th ult.; Mr. George F. Le Jeune, Conductor.

At the recent higher examinations held at Trinity College, London, Elizabeth Firth gained the position of associate pianist, and Francis Victor Lewis was awarded honours in harmony. Both are pupils of Mr. James J. Monk, Liverpool.

A CHORAL Competition and Tonic Sol-Fa Festival is announced to take place at the Crystal Palace on Saturday, June 5, the adjudicators being Dr. Bridge, Messrs. Joseph Barnby and Ebenezer Prout.

REVIEWS.

Handbook of Musical Biography. For the use of General Readers and Schools. By C. A. Caspar and E. M. Patmore. [George Bell and Sons.]

HAD we met with such positive misstatements and extraordinary remarks upon the genius of composers as Messrs. Caspar and Patmore have gathered together anywhere but in a "Handbook" for the use of students, we should unquestionably have placed them amongst our "Curiosities of Musical Criticism." But so pretentious a work demands a notice in our reviewing columns; and although we find it difficult to treat the book seriously, therefore, we will do the best to place our readers in possession of the nature of its contents. Divided into several sections, the composers—or at least those whom the authors consider worthy of the honour—representing the various schools are dismissed usually with a few lines; some, however, such as Handel, Gluck, Mozart, Beethoven, Weber, &c., having two or three pages devoted to a notice of their career. As a specimen of the shorter biographies, we may mention that of Tallis, who was, we are told, "a great favourite at the Court of Queen Elizabeth," and "the composer of the 'Evening Hymn.'" The more lengthy ones are replete with original remarks, the most extraordinary of which perhaps are upon the modern German writers; the compositions of Wagner, we are informed, being "all of them more or less clever reminiscences of Gluck and Weber, with a despised Meyerbeer's noisy instrumentation." Raff has only about three lines and a half, recording the fact that he was "an eccentric writer in the style of Schumann." But the various errors scattered throughout the work surprise us more than the absurd criticisms upon the styles of the composers, because any of the numerous books which are said to have been consulted could at least have set the authors right as to facts. Handel, for example, is said to have written "The Beggar's Opera"; Wagner to have died in 1884; Counterpoint to be "the art of composing fugues"; Cipriani Potter to have been a pupil of Mozart (although Mozart was dead before Potter was born); Weber to have died at the house of "Sir Henry Smart"; and John Barnett to have taken lessons of Dr. Samuel Arnold, the truth being that Dr. Arnold died in the year that Barnett was born. "History," it is often remarked, "repeats itself." Let us hope that such "history" as we are here furnished with may falsify the proverb.

Novello, Ewer and Co.'s Music Primers. Organ Accompaniment of the Choral Service. By J. F. Bridge, Mus. Doc. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

NOTWITHSTANDING its late appearance, we are inclined to think this little treatise will prove as useful and popular as any of Messrs. Novello's Primers. At first sight it might seem that Dr. Bridge's task was uncalled for, since any one who has practical knowledge of the organ should ipso facto be able to accompany at least an ordinary service. But that such is not the case will be within the experience of all who attend church or chapel. It is by no means a rarity to hear a good performance of a Fugue of Bach, or a Sonata of Mendelssohn, and a wretched and inartistic accompaniment by the same player, who may be intent upon displaying his technical skill rather than supporting the choir and congregation by judicious use of his instrument. It is not, however, to those who know the way and do it not that Dr. Bridge chiefly addresses himself, but to those who, while still in a state of pupillage, are called upon to fulfil active duties, and therefore need counsel and suggestion as to the performance of the same. We have no hesitation in saying that to such this Primer will prove extremely valuable. The instructions for the proper "filling in" of the harmonies, for example, are excellent, and if obeyed would save those among a congregation who happen to possess refined musical tastes, the pain caused by hearing terrible progressions of consecutive fifths, awkward leaps in the pedals, perpetual pumping of the swell pedal, and other amateurish imperfections. We had marked several passages for quotation, but we think enough has been said to recommend the work, and, without necessarily expressing agreement with everything laid down, we venture to assert that the young organist who takes Dr. Bridge as an infallible guide, and obeys his directions implicitly, will not go far astray.

Come, all ye Nymphs and Shepherds gay. Part-song. Words by Wion. Composed by W. G. Alcock, F.C.O. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THIS Part-song, dedicated to the members of the Twickenham Choral Society, is effectively written for the voices; and, although somewhat unduly lengthened, may be conscientiously recommended to all who appreciate refined and unpretentious music. The pianoforte part is an important portion of the composition, but presents no difficulty even to an average performer. The phrase commencing "And listen how the carols flow," with its graceful accompaniment, is an excellent point.

Stars of the Summer night. Serenade. Words by Longfellow.

Flow down, cold rivulet. Song. Words by Lord Tennyson. Composed by J. H. Walker. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

ANY composer who chooses for musical colouring such well-known poems as the above, must inevitably bring his work into comparison with that of some of the most celebrated artists of the time; yet with a full knowledge of the songs to the same verses which have preceded those now before us, we conscientiously give high praise to the graceful and musicianlike settings of Mr. Walker. Of the two, we prefer, perhaps, the first on our list; but both are melodious, vocal, and well harmonised; although we are inclined to think that in each song it would have been better if the triplets in the pianoforte accompaniment had been occasionally broken. We may say that the frequent changes of key are in every case most effective, and in happy sympathy with the poetry.

Music Study in Germany. From the Home Correspondence of Amy Fay. [Macmillan and Co., 1886.]

MISS FAY'S pleasant and enthusiastic descriptions of her life and "Music study" in Germany, in her home letters to her family, bear the stamp of American keenness of perception, allied to an almost childish freshness and artistic charm. Her criticisms of the individualities and performances of the great artists of the day, in all branches of music, are clever, original, and spirited. The style is clear and easy, never deviating from the open, unaffected simplicity of a girl anxious to give her honest impressions of a new life and country to her family in her letters, and it never even borders upon pedantry. Her letters also display her earnest and single-minded pursuit of her art, in the face of difficulties and loneliness. Through them, too, comes many a breath of her extremely good business capacity and truly American faculty of attracting notice and making friends. The book also contains much valuable information concerning conservatoires and the different methods and "schools" of pianoforte playing in Germany. The main interest in the book lies, however, in Miss Fay's interesting and graphic descriptions of the individualities and surroundings of the great musicians with whom she came into contact—"names familiar in our mouths as household words"—and with the owners of which but a small portion of her readers have any chance of becoming acquainted in their daily life and work. Tausig, Kullak, the Wiecks, and Clara Schumann, Deppe, the Abbé Liszt, and the like stand out (to quote her own refreshing simile), with all the distinctness of a stereoscopic picture. And if her expressions are sometimes slightly over tinged with roseate light and a somewhat exaggerated admiration and "gush," we can only say with Cherbuliez: Pour admirer assez, il faut admirer trop et un peu d'illusion est nécessaire au bonheur, a line quoted by the authoress on the title page, perhaps in unconscious self-justification. Altogether, the volume is a bright, clever, readable sketch of German life and society, and a welcome addition to the musical literature of the day. And we heartily echo Sir George Grove's wish, expressed in a Preface to the book, that Miss Fay will some day give us an equally charming and faithful account of music and life in the States of America.

What is Art? By James Stanley Little.
[W. Swan Sonnenschein and Co.]

SEYMOUR HADEN's assertion that "Art is not a learned profession"—one of the quotations on the title-page of this volume—seems to have been the text on which the author has discoursed in that free and caustic style which makes his work rather a defiance, than an appeal to, public taste. We may, perhaps, be inclined to say that his remarks would have had greater weight had they been more temperately worded; for although he tells us in the Preface that his book is "from beginning to end an outcry against oppression and prejudice," some readers may even believe that in many pages the author displays the very "oppression and prejudice" that he complains of. There is nothing new in the charge against literary men that, as a rule, they have but a slender knowledge of music; but if, in writing of art, they include this subject, knowledge is absolutely necessary in order to give due effect to their observations. When, for instance, in declaring that inherent cunning of hand or voice has nothing to do with genius, the author of this work, amongst other questions, asks, "Otherwise, why is not the sweetest warbler of ballads a Mendelssohn?" or when he says "The musician has his chromatic scales and his tones and semitones," although we know perfectly well what he means, the manner in which he expresses himself is just such as to make us feel that he only ranks music amongst the fine arts because in the present day he must do so; but that as a powerful agent in the intellectual advancement of the masses, in his heart, he places it far beneath painting, sculpture, or poetry. Apart from these considerations, however, we have nothing but praise for the book. It is true that there may be nothing in it that every true artist has not felt throughout his years of toil, with what we may term the "outer world" for his critics; but the thoughts are so eloquently expressed as to ensure the attention and appreciation of all who believe in the high mission of art. We select, for example, the following, where, after explaining the difference between the scientist and the artist, the author says: "No picture can be capable of satisfying in a sustained manner the subtle refinements of the higher intellect which is not content to leave much unsaid, merely indicating this by hints and suggestions. Pictures whose aim is solely to act as keys to the conclusions of the botanist, meteorologist, or geologist, are useful doubtless as such, but should never be ranked as high art, or, in fact, as art at all, in the sense in which the word has been used, and will continue to be used in these pages. Art is an interpreter, not a transcriber: a suggester, not a realiser. Art does not, or should not, attempt to rival nature, to equal nature even; its aim should be to stamp the mind of one who has looked at nature sympathetically upon canvas. A thinker goes alone to a landscape, and looks at it with eyes which bring to him all manner of yearnings and aspirations. If he be a poet, he puts these thoughts into words; if a painter, upon canvas; and so he enhances the natural beauty of a landscape for ever, which to the unimaginative would only suggest so much prettiness. He thus helps weaker mortals to see and to feel the grand thought-inspiring capabilities inherent in nature, and he registers his own thoughts for others to revel in, and, may be, to enlarge upon." We must do our author the justice to say that he tells us: "I am now and hereafter in this work concerned directly with art as painting"; but as he insists upon constantly indicating the real mission of a composer, we are bound to take notice of his remarks; and more especially, then, as a proof of the place he would assign to the heaven-born tone-poet, we quote the following:—"It is true the musician can command a certain force denied to the painter, in that he can call to his aid the organs of sound,

But this gain is, to my mind, by no means a compensation for the more potent disabilities I have enumerated." These "disabilities," we may say, are stated to be the impossibility of representing tangible form and colour, and the incapacity of doing more than simulate sounds, "such as the rushing of the brook, the warble of the birds, or the crashes of natural forces." But to continue our extract: "Sound is, after all," he says, "a far lower and less subtle sense than sight. Language is a poor vehicle for the expression of thought; and music, although a much higher medium, is also lacking in the elements which would make it possible for it to claim pre-eminence." Here we have music classified from a painter's point of view. Now Thibaut, whose Essay on "Purity in Musical Art" has become well-known in this country through an English translation, says: "I could never grow old in spirit if a kind destiny were to preserve to me all my life-long an unimpaired enjoyment of fine music." Were there real truth in the disparaging observations upon music in the work under notice, men of high intellect, like Thibaut, would rather pray for an "unimpaired enjoyment" of an art which can represent, rather than suggest, to the mind. Mr. Little should be told that "simulating" sound is the very lowest department of music.

The Organ Works of John Sebastian Bach. Edited by J. F. Bridge and James Higgs. Book V.
[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THE present instalment of this very valuable edition of Bach's imperishable organ works contains the last three of the sonatas or trios for two manuals and pedal. Though usually included in the organ works, Spitta tells us that, according to the original MSS., they were intended for the pedal clavier with two manuals. "In his organ music proper Bach turned to account much of his chamber music. But he took care not to transfer the forms without alteration and in their entirety. In contrast to Handel, he never ceased to regard the organ as devoted to the service of the church." But we no longer possess clavier with two manuals and pedals, and the trios can only be played upon the organ. For technical practice their value cannot be over-estimated, while as abstract music we cordially agree with Spitta, who says that they are fully equal to the violin sonatas "in wealth of ideas, in interesting working out, in masterly treatment of the three-part writing, and in sharpness of contrast between each other." It need only be added that the careful fingering and pedalling of Messrs. Bridge and Higgs render this edition specially useful, while the student cannot fail to profit by the terse and clear synopsis of the works.

An Appendix to the Service in G. By Gerard F. Cobb.
[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THIS appendix to Mr. Cobb's excellent and thoughtfully-written service contains the "Benedictus qui venit," "O Salutaris," and the "Agnus Dei," which, though not in the Prayer Book, are now extensively used in the Eucharistic Service; also a setting of the "Nunc dimittis," for use in the same office. The musical merit of these is quite equal to that of the other portions of the service, the "Agnus Dei" being especially pleasing.

Original Compositions for the Organ. No. 48. Sonata in D minor. By Charles H. Lloyd.
[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

IT is not often, even in these days of activity in a branch of art once sadly neglected, that we meet with so meritorious a work for the organ as Mr. Harford Lloyd's Sonata. Of course, the known ability of the composer excited high expectations, and an examination of the music more than realised them. The first movement, in symphonic form, is distinguished by breadth and energy, and the brief Andante sostenuto, in B flat, with an episode in G flat, is very charming. In place of a fugue as a finale, Mr. Lloyd gives us a quasi minuetto, in D major, containing some clever writing, but generally quiet and dignified rather than brilliant. The composer has not piled up difficulties unnecessarily, and his work is therefore within the means of ordinarily competent players.

Notturmo in B flat. For the Pianoforte. Composed by G. J. Rubini. [E. Ascherberger and Co.]

WHATEVER praise is due for writing a melodious and easily playable little Sketch for the pianoforte, has certainly been earned by the composer of this graceful Notturmo. There is no attempt at what is termed "treatment" of the themes; but the passages lie well under the hands, and the piece may be conscientiously recommended both to teachers and pupils.

Soft Voluntaries for the Organ. By George Calkin. Book VII. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

HERE we have six short pieces of two pages each, all, as the title declares, intended for soft stops, but well contrasted with one another. They are written with much elegance and refinement of style. Some of them might have been signed by Henry Smart, and higher praise than this it is impossible to bestow.

FOREIGN NOTES.

THE recent hostile demonstrations directed against the appearance at one of the Berlin Philharmonic Concerts of M. Saint-Saëns, on the part of an ultra-patriotic section of the audience, have since been followed up, in a negative sense, at Bremen, Dresden, and Cassel by the French artist being requested to cancel his engagements entered into with Concert entrepreneurs in those towns. At Prague, too, where M. Saint-Saëns's Opera "Henry VIII." had been in full preparation at the Stadt-Theater, the performance of that work has been abandoned at the last moment. That the wrath of German "patriots" is directed solely against the injudicious public utterances of the artist in question, and in no way against French art as such, every impartial observer knows; but its manifestations, however ephemeral they may be, are, nevertheless, regrettable and somewhat disappointing to the friends of the fatherland of symphonic music. Respecting the "Lohengrin" question in Paris, M. Ernest Reyer writes, in the Journal des Débats:—"The scheme of a 'Lohengrin' première at the Comique has tumbled into the water, but will be fished out again sooner or later. We regret this momentary solution of the Wagner question the less, since we should only have had a curtailed version of the work at the Comique. After the lapse of some little time, Wagner's Opera will be brought out in its entirety at one of our theatres, where mistaken patriotism does not enter into calculations, and it will then be applauded as though it were a work by Mozart or Weber." There is some probability of M. Reyer's prediction being soon realised. It is stated in the Revue Wagnérienne, and other journals, that the well-known impresario M. Schumann will produce "Lohengrin" during the months of May and June next at the Eden Theatre of Paris, with a company of Austrian artists, and in the German language. Should the venture be successful, other works of the poet-composer are to follow. It remains to be seen whether M. Schumann has not been too sanguine. Meanwhile, there was a performance on the 14th ult., at the Eden Theatre, of the music of the first act of "Die Walküre," as forming part of one of M. Lamoureux's Subscription Concerts, which has created an immense enthusiasm, and thus the much vexed Wagner question would seem to be gradually solving itself in the French capital, as it has done long since elsewhere.

The Archbishop of Lyons has addressed a letter to M. Massenet, strongly condemning the performance in that town of that composer's Opera "Hérodiade," which he characterises as a travesty of the personality of St. John the Baptist and a perversion of Biblical history. "Hérodiade," it will be remembered, was first brought out some years since at the De la Monnaie, of Brussels, where it almost monopolised an entire season.

A happy idea has occurred to Herr Munkacsy, the eminent painter, residing in Paris. At the salon where his new picture, representing the dying Mozart listening to the strains of his Requiem, is just now being exhibited, the artist lately caused that immortal composition to be performed in the presence of a select audience, doubtless greatly enhancing thereby the intensity of the impressions to be derived from the contemplation of his picture.

M. Ambroise Thomas, the composer of "Mignon" and of "Hamlet," is engaged upon a new operatic work, entitled "Miranda," which is to be brought out at the Paris Opéra. The libretto is from the pen of M. Jules Barbier, and the subject is borrowed from Shakespeare's "Tempest."

Hector Berlioz's Opera "Benvenuto Cellini" is about to be revived at the Paris Opéra Comique, with M. Talazac in the title part.

According to an arrangement made between the Town Council of Paris and the directors of the Odéon Theatre, the latter have agreed to reserve ten afternoon performances of opera during a season for the special admission of sixteen hundred children from the elementary schools of the capital. The operas performed are to be standard works, and the sum paid by the council for this arrangement is to be 15,000 francs.

M. Pasdeloup, the celebrated Conductor of the now extinct Concerts Populaires of Paris, has just opened a course of instruction in concerted instrumental music in the French capital which is attracting a great number of pupils.

The technical direction of the forthcoming performances at Bayreuth of "Tristan und Isolde" and "Parsifal" has been entrusted to Herr Kranich, of Darmstadt, a pupil of the late Herr Brandt, who so distinguished himself in the management of the scenic and mechanical contrivances at the "Festspiele" of 1876. The following are the names of artists who will fill the principal parts in both the abovementioned works during this year's "Festspiele"—viz., Mesdames Amalia Materna, Therese Malten, Rosa Papier, Rosa Sucher; Herren Betz, Anton Fuchs, H. Gudehus, Albert Niemann, F. Planck, Th. Reichmann, Emil Scaria, Gustav Siehr, Heinrich Vogl, H. Wiegand, and Hermann Winkelmann—a goodly array, truly, of first-rate artists, considering the very limited number of "principal" characters represented in "Tristan" and in "Parsifal."

In the January number of the Bayreuther Blätter, a number of letters written by Richard Wagner are published for the first time, containing interesting references as to the history of the foundation of the "Festspiele," the erection of the Bayreuth Theatre, and kindred subjects, all of them worthy the notice of the many admirers of the master. The present year, it will be remembered, is the tenth after the first production of the "Nibelungen" Tetralogy at Bayreuth.

The Monatshefte für Musikgeschichte has unearthed the following critique on Richard Wagner's first Symphony (produced at the Leipzig Gewandhaus on January 10, 1833), contained in the Allgemeine Musikalische Zeitung of that period, viz.:—"The new Symphony of the youthful R. Wagner (he is barely twenty) was, with the exception of its second movement, most favourably received by a very numerous audience, as indeed it deserved to be. We should scarcely be able to say what more could be expected from a first essay in this exalted art-form, unless indeed our demands exceeded all reasonable bounds. The work may be considered the result of much application, while the imaginative powers displayed in it are by no means small; its peculiar construction betrays originality of thought, and the entire work, in fact, evidences so much genuine and earnest exertion in the right direction that we can only regard this young man with hopeful anticipation for his future. Although his manifest endeavours to remain true to himself as yet cost him some considerable efforts, and although his use of orchestral effects lacks at present the necessary experience . . . these are shortcomings which continued application to his art will soon obliterate. That which Herr Wagner already possesses cannot be acquired at all, since it must be born within the soul."

A "cycnus" of Wagner's stage works, ranging from "Rienzi" to the "Ring des Nibelungen," has just been completed at the Leipzig Stadt-Theater.

A Symphony in F, by Eugen d'Albert, has just been produced with much success at one of the Philharmonic Concerts of Berlin.

Mendelssohn's first operatic work, "Die Hochzeit des Camacho," was produced on the 9th ult., at a Concert of the Berlin Opern Verein, under the direction of Georg Bloch. The work was originally performed on April 29, 1827, at the Berlin Schauspielhaus, after its original libretto (by Carl Klingemann) had been rewritten by the Freiherr von Lichtenstein for that purpose.

This year's Music Festival of the Lower Rhine will take place from the 13th to the 15th day of June, at Cologne, under direction of Dr. Wüllner, the able successor of the late Ferdinand Hiller at the Conservatorium of that town. Among the principal works announced for performance, are Brahms's new Symphony, Handel's Oratorio "Belshazzar," the Finale from the first act of "Parsifal," and the Ninth Symphony.

A monument is to be erected on May 31 next, to Joseph Haydn, at the Esterhazy Gardens of Vienna. The statue of the composer is from the chisel of Herr Natter, the well-known Austrian sculptor.

Victor Nessler's Opera "Der Trompeter von Säkkingen" has now been brought out at the Vienna Hof-Theater, and is likely to prove the principal success of the season at that establishment. "The enthusiastic reception accorded to this opera," says the Vienna Fremdenblatt, "may cause some surprise, since its musical value is but slight. The fact, however, remains, and can only be accounted for as being the result of a reaction against the unsympathetic oriental or antediluvian subjects treated of in modern opera, while the love of melody, pure and simple, doubtless also forms an element in the success achieved by the work."

The French normal diapason is to be definitely introduced on the 1st inst. at the Imperial Opera of Vienna.

Beethoven's Ninth Symphony has recently been performed four times within the space of one week at Königsberg, under the direction of Herr Laudien. The great work had been most carefully rehearsed for months previous, and the unprecedented homage rendered to it in the present instance is said to be owing to the equally abnormal demand for tickets of admission on the part of the Königsberg public.

Strauss's new operetta "Der Zigeunerbaron" (The Gipsy-Baron) was performed for the first time on the 5th ult., at the Friedrich-Wilhelmstadt Theater, of Berlin, and met with a most favourable reception.

At the Eighth Gürzenich Concert on the 9th ult., at Cologne, Johannes Brahms conducted his new Symphony in E minor, and played the solo part in his Pianoforte Concerto in D minor. The same Concert also included a performance of Brahms's "Song of Destiny." Respecting the new Symphony (the fourth of its gifted composer), Dr. Hanslick points out the fact, in the Neue Freie Presse, of Vienna, that the work is remarkable for its key, for, curiously enough, neither Mozart, Beethoven, Schubert, Mendelssohn, nor Schumann have produced a symphony in E minor. The new work appears, however, to be a remarkable one in other and more important respects also, and has been received with great enthusiasm by German audiences wherever it has been produced. The Wiener Musikalische Zeitung furnishes an interesting résumé of the critical opinions expressed in leading Austrian papers on the subject, while Herr Otto Lessmann, of the Berlin Allgemeine Musikzeitung, expresses his estimate of the work in these words: "It is not bestowing too much praise in pronouncing it the most important production in orthodox symphonic form since Beethoven."

Victorien Joncières's "Le Chevalier Jean," so successfully brought out at Cologne some time since, is being actively rehearsed at the Royal Berlin Opera, where it will shortly be produced.

Victor Massé's opera "Une nuit de Cléopâtre" was recently brought out with much success at the Hamburg Stadt-Theater.

A new opera, entitled "Merlin," by Carl Goldmark, will shortly be first produced at the Vienna Hof-Theater. The composer is said to have been engaged upon this work for the last ten years, and its performance is looked forward to with much interest in the Austrian capital.

A monument is to be erected at Königsberg to Carl Löwe, who exercised an important influence upon the development of the modern German lied, more especially as regards the "ballade," and whose compositions generally are just now experiencing a distinct revival in the Concert-rooms of the Fatherland.

During a recent short stay at Venice, Franz Liszt was prevailed upon to play a few pieces at the Salon of the Countess Hatzfeld, amidst an enthusiasm on the part of his audience proportionate to the exceptional nature of the event, the opportunities of hearing the veteran Maestro, even in private circles, being now of very rare occurrence.

Signor Lamperti, the impresario of the Apollo Theatre at Rome, brought out Beethoven's "Fidelio" on the 4th ult.—the first production of that immortal masterpiece in Italy, according to the assertion of Continental journals. We can hardly believe the latter statement to be correct.

A somewhat curious story has lately been making the round of Italian papers. It appears that, in December last, there was found in one of the carriages of the express train running between Venice and Bologna, what proved to be the manuscript of a complete opera, fully scored, and, according to the opinion of competent judges, possessing considerable musical merit. According to an indication contained in the manuscript, both libretto and music are by the same author, whose name, however, does not appear. The parcel has been handed to the police authorities of Venice, but, despite the currency which the story of its discovery has obtained, the "poet-composer" (who must needs be a genius to be so indifferent about the matter!) has not, as yet, claimed his property.

Operas in modern Italy, it should be remembered, however, are, in most instances, a species of mushroom growth. There are, on the average, some sixty new operatic works actually brought out at Italian theatres in the course of a twelvemonth, not to reckon those that are composed during that period but never performed, and the number of which must be very considerable. So prolific indeed is the production in this branch of the art, that aspiring young Maestri are beginning, it would seem, to make their début before the public with two operatic works—to choose from, as it were. Thus we read in Italian journals: "The Maestro Giuseppe Pastore, a hitherto entirely unknown composer, has just completed two new operas; one in two acts, entitled 'La Caverna meravigliosa,' the other in three acts, called 'Una Lucrezia toscana.'"

A new opera by a Portuguese composer is, on the other hand, a comparatively rare production. We record the recent first and very successful performance at Lisbon of a comic opera, "A Garra de Leão," the libretto from the pen of Francisco Palha, the music by Francisco de Freitas Gazu.

Notwithstanding a very indifferent performance, a new opera by E. de Michalowich, entitled "Hagbarth und Signe," obtained a great success upon its recent first production at the Theatre of Buda-Pesth.

Wagner's "Die Meistersinger" was produced for the first time at the Metropolitan Opera House of New York, in January last, and elicited much enthusiasm. Herr Fischer sang the part of Hans Sachs, Herr Stritt that of Walther von Stolzing, and Frau Kraus that of Eva.

Under the title of "L'œuvre dramatique de Richard Wagner," a volume containing an analysis of the music dramas of the Bayreuth master is about to be published in Paris, from the pen of MM. Albert Loubies and Charles Malherbe.

A second edition has just been issued at Berlin of Dr. Langhans' very thoughtful little volume on the cultivation of musical taste, entitled "Das musikalische Urtheil und seine Ausbildung durch die Erziehung."

M. Victor Wilder has completed his French version of Wagner's drama "Tristan und Isolde," and the work is now in the press. The accomplished translator is at present engaged upon rendering a similar service to his countrymen in regard to the same master's gigantic "Nibelungen" Tetralogy.

We have received the first numbers of a fortnightly journal, Musikalische Jugendpost, published at Cologne (P. J. Tonger), and devoted to the musical instruction and entertainment of young folks. Appropriate pianoforte and vocal pieces are appended to each number, and the new publication appears to fully deserve every support in the quarter for which it is intended.

At Paris died, on January 30, Adolphe Gustave Chouquet, Conservator of musical instruments at the Conservatoire, and author of a very meritorious "Histoire de la musique dramatique en France." Chouquet was born at Havre on April 16, 1819.

CORRESPONDENCE.

CHARLES DIBDIN.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—In proposing to amend one or two of the statements in Mr. Barrett's contribution on this subject to your latest issue, I have no desire to disparage that interesting and valuable paper. The errors are chiefly those of his precursors in the field, but their endorsement by so able a writer in so important a magazine furnishes an appropriate opportunity for remarking on them.

Hogarth is, I think, first responsible for the statement that Garrick procured Dibdin's discharge from Covent Garden Theatre on account of his desertion of Miss Pitt. Dibdin left Covent Garden in 1768, in which year he composed "The Padlock" for Garrick, and acted in it at Drury Lane. Charles Dibdin the younger, and Tom Dibdin, were born in 1768 and 1771 respectively, so that the desertion of their mother could not very well have preceded the latter date. Dibdin's dismissal from Drury Lane was in 1774, in which year it seems probable that he also separated from Miss Pitt. It was in that year that Charles Dibdin the younger was adopted by his uncle. It is not unlikely, therefore, that there was a connection between the two events, as Garrick (who was Tom Dibdin's godfather) had always been and continued friendly to Miss Pitt. Garrick probably procured Dibdin's "dismissal" from Covent Garden; but, if so, it was by tempting him to the rival house. Dibdin did not return to Covent Garden till 1778, and when he left it again Garrick was dead.

Mr. Barrett states Dibdin had a large family by Miss Pitt. I am not aware that there were any children besides the two already named. There is no reason to think the connection lasted more than six or seven years at the utmost (1767-1774), and this period scarcely admits of a very large family.

So far as I am aware, Hogarth is the first and only authority for the "first wife," who is also stated to have had several children. Dibdin having been born in 1745 (the commonly-assumed date), he cannot have been more than twenty-two years old when he deserted her. Mr. W. H. Husk, writing in 1870, says, "I cannot find any evidence proving whether C. Dibdin was or was not married to Miss Pitt, the mother of his two well-known sons, Charles and Thomas. If he did not marry Miss Pitt, who was the first (unnamed) wife, by whom 'he had five children, who all died infants'?" Tom Dibdin, in his 'Reminiscences,' says that his father was followed to his grave by himself, his brother Charles, John Taylor (of the Sun), and a medical gentleman. Now, it is not usual, I think, for widows, particularly second wives, to call in their husbands' natural children to perform such a duty, although of course there may be exceptions." To this I would only add that the attitude throughout the affair, of the morally fastidious Garrick, goes far to strengthen Mr. Husk's theory. He was not the likeliest man to smile on an illicit union, or bitterly resent its abandonment.

The date of the "Shepherd's Artifice," given as 1762, is Dibdin's own statement. Genest, however, gives the date of production as 1765, and this is almost irresistibly confirmed by the published libretto bearing the same date. If so, Dibdin was twenty when it was produced, although he most emphatically says seventeen—unless, indeed, we are astray as to the date of his birth. We have to choose between two statements, one of which apparently must be wrong. I do not pretend to decide the matter which could only be disposed of by certain evidence of the date of birth. But if seventeen was the age of the composer of the "Shepherd's Artifice," Dibdin's connection with Miss Pitt was formed before he was twenty. It is worthy of note that at least one contemporary record of his death gives the date of his birth as 1748. Some of your Southampton readers would settle an important point if they could discover the register containing the record of Dibdin's baptism. He seems to have been systematically astray as to the early dates of his life as he assigns "Love in a City" to 1764, not 1767, which appears to be the proper date.

The interesting discovery for which we are indebted to Mr. Barrett, in reference to Dibdin's life at Winchester, further illustrates this point. The boy is admitted Junior Chorister in June, 1756, at which time he was in his twelfth year, if born in March, 1745. Dibdin, however, says he came under the charge of Mr. Fussell when he was nine. With regard to the absence of Dibdin's name from Winchester College books—is this conclusive proof that he received no instruction there? Is not some provision usually made for the education of cathedral choristers? If so, it would be well to ascertain what provision is and was made at Winchester.

The authorship of "The Trip to Portsmouth" is given to Dibdin, but he himself says it was written by G. A. Stevens, and elsewhere calls it "a poor rickety thing, in which there were some decently-written songs which I set." Some of the verses are obviously not by Dibdin, while others are very much in his manner. Hogarth gives a number of them in his collection, but that does not amount to much, as he also includes poems by Garrick, Bickerstaff, Burns, &c. Even if the songs were Dibdin's, it is doubtful if they were his first nautical pieces. Kitchener indicates the song "Jack's alive" as the first song Dibdin ever set to music. This he states on the composer's own authority, and it certainly has all the appearance of a juvenile effusion. It is interesting to note that his muse so early had a bent in the direction in which it was eventually to win him lasting renown. The statement that "Blow high, blow low," was the first of Dibdin's sea-songs is a misapprehension, originating in his own statement that it was the first of those sea-songs which have received so much applause from the public—i.e., it was his first distinct hit in this line.

With regard to Dibdin's work for the Dublin Theatre, of which nothing has hitherto been known, some little light is thrown on it by a play I picked up lately, entitled "A Match for a Widow; or, the Frolics of Fancy;" a comic opera in three acts, as performed at the Theatre Royal, Dublin. London: printed for C. Dilly, in the Poultrey, 1788." In the dedication to Richard Daly, the author, speaking of his work, says: "It was then transmitted to Mr. Dibdin, in London, who embellished it with his harmony."

Whatever may be the merit of "Music Epitomised," it may at least be placed to Dibdin's credit that in it he invented the form of instructive musical catechism which has since been very frequently and usefully employed, and I think his methods in it and his other instruction books are certainly ingenious and well stated.

There are several other points of minor importance, but having already presumed sufficiently on your valuable space, I will merely mention three. There seems to be no evidence that Dibdin had a situation in the house of Johnson. A reference to the Autobiography (p. 17, vol. i.) does not convey such an idea. "The Gipsies" was set by Arnold, not Arne; and it was the Circus, and not the Helicon, to which a license was refused.—Yours faithfully,

ED. RIMBAULT DIBDIN.

THE RISELEY CONTROVERSY AT BRISTOL.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—I shall be obliged by your giving publicity to the following reply from the Dean of Bristol to a letter which I had addressed to him upon this subject.

I am, Sir, very truly yours,

WILLIAM MANN.

Canon's House, Bristol, February 18, 1886.

"February 17, 1886.

"MY DEAR PRECENTOR,—It is true that at the recent Visitation held in our Cathedral, though the matter at issue had no reference whatever to the relations between the Precentor and the Organist, statements were made regarding those relations, some of which were untrue and others inaccurate. These statements should not have been admitted; as no opportunity was granted for rebutting them. I also am aware that reports equally untrue and unwarranted have been since circulated to your prejudice.

"I am glad that you give me an opportunity to state my assured belief that throughout your official duties as Precentor you have endeavoured to act in conformity with the directions which I had studiously framed on what I understood to be the meaning of the statutes, and to discharge those duties faithfully under circumstances of unusual difficulty. You are at liberty to deal with this my answer to your note as you think best.

"Your yours very faithfully,

"GILBERT ELLIOT.

"P.S.—It may be well for me to add that I have shown this letter to all the Canons, and that they concur in the sentiments I have expressed in it.

"The Rev. Precentor Mann."

MADRIGALS.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—I venture to suggest, through your columns, that a subscription issue (in octavo size) of English, Flemish, and Italian Madrigals, under competent editorship, would not be a commercial failure, and, besides being a boon to students, would tend to the advancement of art through the medium of choral classes, for to these madrigals are at present almost a sealed book. Could not the enterprising house of Novello, Ewer and Co. do something for us in this way?—Yours, &c.,

Birmingham, February 4, 1886.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

* Notices of concerts, and other information supplied by our friends in the country, must be forwarded as early as possible after the occurrence; otherwise they cannot be inserted. Our correspondents must specifically denote the date of each concert, for without such date no notice can be taken of the performance.

Our correspondents will oblige by writing all names as clearly as possible, as we cannot be responsible for any mistakes that may occur.

Correspondents are informed that their names and addresses must accompany all communications.

We cannot undertake to return offered contributions; the authors, therefore, will do well to retain copies.

Notice is sent to all Subscribers whose payment (in advance) is exhausted. The paper will be discontinued where the Subscription is not renewed. We again remind those who are disappointed in obtaining back numbers that, although the music is always kept in stock, only a sufficient quantity of the rest of the paper is printed to supply the current sale.

BRIEF SUMMARY OF COUNTRY NEWS.

We do not hold ourselves responsible for any opinions expressed in this Summary, as all the notices are either collated from the local papers or supplied to us by correspondents.

BAGSHOT.—A special service was held in St. Anne's Church on Saturday, the 6th ult., the occasion being the dedication of the new east window to the memory of the late Duke of Albany. The memorial is the gift of the Duke and Duchess of Connaught, Princess Louise, and Princess Beatrice, and consists of a five-light window in the Italian style of the sixteenth century, the subject being the Crucifixion. The Rev. Canon Duckworth read the dedicatory prayers, and the very Rev. Randall Davidson, Dean of Windsor, delivered a brief address from the chancel steps. The anthem, "Thine, O Lord, is the greatness," specially composed for the occasion by Mr. J. More Smieton, was carefully rendered by the choir. Mr. G. Paxton More presided at the organ, and played as voluntaries Gounod's "Marche Religieuse" and Guilman's "Cantilène Pastorale," these pieces having being selected by the Duke and Duchess of Connaught.

BARNET.—On the 9th ult., the fourth annual Concert of the Vocal Union was given under the direction of Mr. W. F. Schiwer, F.C.O., L.R.A.M. Handel's Serenata Acis and Galatea formed the chief item of the programme, with Miss Julia Jones as Galatea, Mr. Lawrence Freyer as Acis, and Mr. R. de Lacy as Polyphemus. The choir was thoroughly satisfactory, both in the Serenata and Mendelssohn's 43rd Psalm. The solo pianists were Mr. Schiwer and Mr. William H. Stocks, A.C.O., who played the Symphonic Poem "Danse Macabre," Saint-Saëns, arranged for two pianofortes by the author. Other accompanists were Miss Richards and Mr. Stocks (pianoforte), and Mr. W. Richards (organ).

BECKENHAM.—The first Concert of the Vocal Union was given on the 16th ult., and was marked by general excellence. The programme consisted of high class music, including Gounod's "O Sing to God," Stainer's "O clap your hands," and unaccompanied pieces by Barby, Küken, and Sullivan, all of which were well rendered. Mr. Waldo Morell is promoter and Conductor of the Society, which is worked strictly upon the Tonic Sol-fa system.

BEDFORD.—The last of the Monday Popular Concerts, for the present series, took place on the 1st ult., the programme being devoted to the works of Mozart. The vocalist was Miss Alice M. Burnett, a young débütante, who won golden opinions by her unaffected manner of singing. The string quartets were excellently played by Messrs. Burnett, Halpenny, Richardson, and Woolhouse. Mozart's Concerto, for two pianofortes, was well rendered by Mr. Diemer and his pupil, Miss Annie Hartley. Mr. Cecil Goodall was the accompanist.

BELFAST.—The members of the Queen's College Musical Society gave a Concert in the Examination Hall of the College, on January 29, before a large audience. The principal item in the programme was Hoffmann's Cantata Melusine, which, under the excellent conductorship of Herr Bayschlag, was admirably rendered. The solo vocalists were Miss Rutherford, Miss Harbinson, Mr. T. Blair Boyd, Mr. T. King, and Mr. C. E. Whitcher, all of whom were highly efficient. Praise must also be awarded to Mr. Carl Leckie for his able pianoforte accompaniment to the work. The second part was miscellaneous. Herr Bayschlag has indeed a right to be proud of the result of his efforts in the cause of this Society, of which we may say Her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales has recently become the Patroness. The third Concert of the Philharmonic Society took place at the Ulster Hall, on the 5th ult., under the conductorship of Herr Bayschlag, the room being crowded in every part. Max Bruch's Fair Ellen was exceedingly well performed, as was also a long miscellaneous selection. The principal artists were Miss Carlotta Elliott, Madame Trebelli, Mr. Henry Guy, and Mr. Frederic King, vocalists; Signor Bisaccia (pianoforte), and M. Hollman (violoncello).

BRIGG.—At a miscellaneous Concert, given on the 18th ult., Mendelssohn's Hear my Prayer was excellently performed, Miss Vinnie Beaumont taking the solos most effectively; Mr. C. Moxon also sang with great taste, and both artists were loudly applauded by an appreciative audience.

BRIGHTON.—The third Annual Réunion and Dinner of the Musical Fraternity of Brighton took place at the Criterion, West Street, on the 13th ult. The chair was taken by Mr. Alfred King, Mus. Bac., and the vice-chair by Mr. W. Kuhe. After dinner a Grand march, composed by the chairman, and numerous toasts were given, Mr. Kuhe in proposing prosperity to the Society, paying a deserved tribute to the memory of the eminent musicians lately deceased, and alluding to the loss sustained by the death of Mr. George Watts. During the evening reference was made to the services rendered to music in Brighton by Mr. R. Taylor, who, in responding, proposed that there should be a small annual subscription to the Society, to cover the expense of a dinner, and to afford assistance to those members who were in need. Several songs and pianoforte pieces were given, and a provisional committee, with Mr. G. Crook as Hon. Secretary, was formed to carry out Mr. Taylor's excellent scheme.

BRISBANE.—A performance of Handel's Messiah was given at the Theatre Royal, on December 9, 1885, by the members of the Musical Union, as a complimentary benefit to their Conductor, Mr. R. T. Jefferies. The principal vocalists were Miss Atkinson, Mrs. Snow, Miss Johnston, Mrs. Kelk, Mr. Jones, and Mr. McRobbie. The choruses were exceedingly well rendered, and the performance generally was most successful.

BROCKLEY.—The second Concert of the St. Peter's Choral Society was given at St. Peter's Hall, on the 16th ult. Gade's Cantata The Erl-King's Daughter formed the first part of the programme, and received an excellent rendering by the Society, under Dr. C. J. Frost's able conductorship, the leading parts being well sustained by Miss Catherine Devlin, Miss Bertha Ball, and Mr. Robert Grice, the new vicar of the Cathedral. Miss Edith Goldsbro, A.R.M., presided at the pianoforte. The second part was miscellaneous, and included a new five-part song, "Love is still in leading strings," the composition of the Conductor, which was well received. The singing of the choir was excellent. Dr. Stainer's St. Mary Magdalen is to be given at the next Concert.

CAMBORNE.—A Popular Concert was given by the members of the Choral Society, in the Assembly Rooms, on Thursday evening, the 17th ult. The programme consisted of Hutchinson's Cantata The Story of Elizabeth, and a miscellaneous selection. The vocalists were Miss Clara Dowle, Miss Lina Tyack, Mr. C. Bartle, and Mr. T. H. Blight. Miss Boyen presided at the pianoforte, Mr. G. J. Smith at the harmonium, and Mr. Richard White, Jun., conducted.

CARDIFF.—The first Concert of the twelfth season of the Choral Society took place on the 17th ult., the principal item in the programme being Dvorák's Spectre's Bride. The interest attaching to the work attracted a larger audience than usual to the Park Hall, and the performance was received with much enthusiasm throughout. The solo vocalists were Miss Annie Morris, Mr. Harper Kearton, and Mr. Thurlay Beale, all of whom acquitted themselves well. The chorus performed their difficult part admirably. The Cantata was followed by Mr. A. C. Mackenzie's Birmingham Violin Concerto, the solo part being brilliantly rendered by Herr Josef Ludwig, and enthusiastically received. Mr. Deacon performed a solo on the organ. Mr. Davies was an efficient Conductor.

CHELMSFORD.—The members of the Musical Society gave a Concert in the Corn Exchange on Wednesday, the 2nd ult. The programme consisted of Bennett's May Queen and a miscellaneous selection. The solo vocalists were Miss Kate Norman, Miss M. Holgate, Mr. Gawthrop, and Mr. Tufnall. The band was ably led by Mr. C. Byford, and Mr. F. R. Frye, F.C.O., conducted. The work was well rendered throughout.

CONGLETON.—A successful Concert was given by Messrs. H. Latham and K. Read, in the Town Hall, on the 10th ult., at which the following artists appeared: vocalists, Miss Elliott, and Signor R. M. Nette Carpena, violinist, and Mr. Jeffrey, in the place of Mr. Sidney Naylor, acted as accompanist. Mr. H. Latham sang the tenor music in the concerted pieces, in the absence of Mr. Bywater, who was indisposed. The programme was excellently rendered, the artists receiving the warmest applause. Every available space in the hall was filled, many being unable to obtain admittance.

CULLOMPTON.—Mr. J. Gosden gave his fifth annual Concert at the Assembly Rooms, on the 9th ult., before a large audience. The solo vocalists were Madame Probert-Goodwin, Miss Bessie Frost, Mr. John Hayden, and Mr. W. H. Thomas, all of whom were thoroughly successful. The programme included some part-songs, which were well sung, and warmly received. Mr. Gosden accompanied, and also played a pianoforte solo.

DALKEITH.—Spohr's Last Judgment and Handel's Acts and Galatians were performed by the Choral Society, on the 4th ult., before a large audience. The works were very efficiently rendered. Miss Vinnie Beaumont and Messrs. McCall and Macdonald were the professional artists engaged, and their excellent singing was highly appreciated.

EASTBOURNE.—On Wednesday afternoon, the 10th ult., Mr. Carrodus gave a Violin Recital at the Devonshire Park Pavilion, to a numerous audience. He was assisted by Miss Fenna as vocalist, and Miss May Bright accompanied on the piano. — On the evening of the same day, a most successful rendering of Barby's Rebekah was given by the Presbyterian Church Choir, in the Church Rooms, South Street. The solos were well sung by Misses Hull, Newsam, and Nichol, and Messrs. G. Fox, Thwaites, and Hall. The choruses were sung in a style which would have done credit to any choral body. The second part consisted of part-songs and popular ballads, rendered by the before-mentioned vocalists. Miss Bony and Mr. T. H. Luellen presided respectively at the piano and harmonium with much efficiency, and great credit is due to Mr. J. H. Earnshaw, the Conductor, for the manner in which he has trained his choir. The hall was well filled.

ELLON, N.B.—The Orchestral Society gave a very successful Concert, in the Town Hall, on Friday, January 20. The orchestra was under the able leadership of Mr. Whiteley, Organist of the Parish Church. The frequent applause showed that the untiring efforts of the Conductor to promote the culture of classical music have not been in vain. Miss Gollan was well received in her songs, and Mr. Scott Skinner (the eminent Scotch violinist) gave three solos with much effect. Mr. Newsam was the accompanist.

FAVERSHAM.—The Concert of Mr. C. D. Hobday, at the Institute, on January 27, was exceedingly well attended, and highly successful. The artists were Miss Grimson (pianoforte), Messrs. S. Dean Grimson and H. Morley (violin), Mr. G. Lawrence (viola), and Mr. H. T. Trist (violinello), songs being contributed by Miss Alice Parry and Mr. Arthur Thompson. Miss Grimson (who is only fifteen years of age) won warm and well-deserved applause for her pianoforte solos, and also accompanied the violin solo of her father, and those of Messrs. Trust and Lawrence on the violinello and violin respectively.

HALIFAX, N.S.—On Thursday, January 28, Handel's Messiah was given in St. Paul's Church by a choir of about forty voices. The orchestral accompaniment was furnished by the Haydn Quintet Club, numbering twelve instruments. The soloists were Miss Lizzie McKenzie, Mrs. J. McD. Taylor, Miss Maggie Bligh, Mr. George Burgoyne, and Mr. C. J. Ross. The whole performance was very creditable, the choruses, with one or two exceptions, being sung with considerable precision and effect. Prof. S. Porter, Organist of the Church, conducted, and played the organ accompaniments.

HAMILTON (CANADA).—Mr. A. C. Mackenzie's Oratorio The Rose of Sharon was performed on January 21 by the Philharmonic Society, this being its first production in Canada. The rendering of the work was, considering the many difficulties, very creditable both to band and choir, the "St. Stephen" being very well sung. The soloists were Mrs. Gertrude Luther, Mrs. McCulloch, Mr. F. Jenkins, Mr. F. W. Wodell, Mr. D. Steele, and Mr. J. H. Stuart, all of whom acquitted themselves so as to gain the favour of the audience. Mr. F. H. Torrington conducted, and much praise is due to him for his indefatigable exertions to secure success.

HEYWOOD, MANCHESTER.—On Tuesday evening, the 9th ult., a very interesting and highly successful rendering of Root's Cantata Daniel was given in the York Street Congregational Church by the Church Choir, assisted by Miss Walsley and other members of the Choir. Mr. W. H. Jewell, the Organist, played the accompaniments, and Mr. Knight, the Choirmaster, conducted with his usual ability.

HIGH WYCOMBE.—The Choral Association gave the second Concert of the season in the Town Hall on the 15th ult. The programme included Bennett's Woman of Samaria, and songs and part-songs by Goring Thomas, Blumenthal, Barby, Lemmens, &c. The principal artists were Miss Gilbert, Mrs. Webb, Mr. Weston, and Mr. Rose. Mr. J. G. Wrigley, F.C.O., Mus. Bac, Oxon., conducted, and played Chopin's Nocturne in F minor, Moszkowski's Serenade, and Mendelssohn's "Spinner's Song."

HURSTPIERPOINT.—The Choral Society gave its first Concert this season on the 11th ult., in the Dining Hall of St. John's College, under the conductorship of Mr. H. C. Young, B.A., Cantab, late Organist of the Parish Church. The Lay of the Last Minstrel, a new Cantata by T. Mee Pattison, was performed in a highly satisfactory manner. The soloists were Mrs. Warne, Miss Selfe, Mr. F. W. J. Ford, and Mrs. Bebbington. There was a small but efficient orchestra, and the piece was well received. Notable features in the second part of the programme were the part-songs "Three children sliding" (Pearson) and "Good night, farewell" (Garrett), the harp solos of Mr. Edwin Smith, and the violin solos of Mr. J. M. Gray, pupil of Mr. Carrodus.

KETERING.—The Choral Society gave the second Concert of the season on the 1st ult., when Mendelssohn's St. Paul was given, with Miss Ethel Winn, Miss Layton, Mr. Dunkerton, and Mr. Winn as soloists. Miss Winn's singing was marked by great expression and feeling, as well as by distinct enunciation, these qualities being especially noticeable in her rendering of the aria "Jerusalem." The other soloists were very successful, the choir did their part of the work with spirit and precision, and the band was fairly efficient. Mr. H. G. Golch conducted.

LAUNCESTON, CORNWALL.—A Special Service was held in the Parish Church on Thursday, the 18th ult., consisting of lessons read from the Bible account of Elijah, and selections of music from Mendelssohn's Oratorio Elijah. The choir was augmented for the occasion, Mr. Dalby presiding at the organ. The whole of the music was most satisfactorily rendered and much appreciated by a large congregation. The Church in the West, in speaking of a similar service, held in the same Church on St. Paul's Day (January 25), says, "It was a service of considerable interest, and shows what can be done, in spite of the Act of Uniformity, and is an answer to the call for some legislation for greater elasticity in the public services."

LEICESTER.—The second of Mr. Harvey Lohr's Chamber Concerts for the present season took place on the 3rd ult., at the Museum Lecture Hall. Mr. Lohr was ably assisted by Mr. J. G. Robertson (vocalist), Mdlle. Anne Lang (violin), and Mr. W. E. Whitehouse (violinello). A classical programme was excellently rendered. Mr. Lohr's pianoforte playing being, as usual, a feature of the evening. — On Sunday afternoon, the 7th ult., a Choral Service was held at St. Andrew's Church, when William Carter's Sacred Cantata, Placidia, the Christian Martyr, was given. The church was crowded with an appreciative congregation. The soloists were Mrs. E. E. Brown, Miss Florence Adderley, Mr. A. Page, and Mr. R. C. Allen, and the choruses were taken by members of the St. Andrew's Choir, assisted by several members of the Leicester Choral Society, numbering altogether about seventy voices. Mr. R. H. Craven, Organist of Wigston Parish Church, conducted; and Mr. Fred Cartwright, Organist of the Church, presided at the organ. The whole of the service was carefully rendered. The offertory was in aid of the Choir Fund.

LINCOLN.—The members of the Harmonic Society gave their first Concert of the present season, in the Corn Exchange, on the 16th ult. The programme consisted of Rossini's Stabat Mater and Spohr's Last Judgment. The solo vocalists were Miss B. Moore, Miss Helen d'Alton, Mr. Redfern Hollins, and Mr. F. Barrington Foote. Mr. C. W. Moore presided at the piano, and Mr. J. G. Wrigley, Mus. Bac, of Nottingham, conducted. The works were well rendered, and the Concert most successful.

MAIDENHEAD.—On the 16th ult., the members of the Philharmonic Society gave their second Concert of the season in the Town Hall. The programme was miscellaneous, and included Mendelssohn's 42nd Psalm, Spohr's "As pants the hart," Barby's "Wife's Song," Lemmens's "Drops of Rain," Quartet in D minor, for strings (Haydn), Cantata (Mendelssohn), and short piano solos by Chopin, Moszkowski, Mendelssohn, &c. The vocalist was Miss Jessie Royd. String Quartet, Messrs. Henkel, Reiter, Dowson, and Ellison; solo pianoforte and Conductor, Mr. J. G. Wrigley, Mus. Bac, Oxon. Mendelssohn's Elijah is announced for the last Concert.

MARKET DRAYTON.—The local Choral Society gave an excellent rendering of Judas Macabbeus, on the 9th ult., before a large audience. The solos were taken by Misses Annie Beaumont and Emilie Lloyd, Messrs. Frederick and Harriet, all of whom acquitted themselves to the satisfaction of the audience.

MARYPORT.—On Friday evening, the 5th ult., the members of the Amateur Orchestral Society gave their third annual Concert in the Athenaeum Hall, before a large audience. The Concert was a great success in every respect, the band especially showing much improvement. The vocalists were local amateurs, the most promising being Mr. J. Thompson, pupil of Mr. Metcalfe, Carlisle.

NEW MILLS.—The second Concert of the season, in connection with the New Mills and District Philharmonic Society, took place on the 18th ult. in the Public Hall. The solo vocalist was Miss Bessie Holt, who was highly successful in all her songs. Mr. Edwin Bates led the band, Master James Pollard accompanied, and Mr. W. T. Whitehead conducted.

PENZANCE.—Mr. R. White, Junr., gave an Organ Recital in St. John's Hall, on Friday evening, the 12th ult. The soloists were Miss Clara Dowle, Miss Kate Doane, and Mr. M. Sampson, all of whom were very successful. Mr. White, in his organ solos, displayed great musical ability, in execution, feeling, and finish he left nothing to be desired. Mr. White's pianoforte accompaniment was also much admired.

PORTMAUDOC.—An Evening Concert was given at the Assembly Rooms, on January 26. The programme included violin solos, excellently rendered by Mr. Theodore Lawson; Schumann's "Études Symphoniques," finely played by Miss Annie Cantelo, A.R.A.M., who also contributed a feature in the form of an original composition; Hummel's Trio in G (Op. 65), played by the artists already named and Mr. J. Hopkinson (violinello). "The Heavens are telling" (Creation), and several part-songs were sung by the Choral Society, and vocal solos were contributed by members of the Society. The string band played the March from Carmen and other pieces. Mr. J. Roberts conducted. There was a good attendance.

PLYMOUTH.—The Corporation Concert, on the 13th ult., was one of the best yet given by Mr. John Hele, the Borough Organist. An excellent programme, under the able conductorship of Mr. S. Weekes, was well rendered and most warmly received. The Misses Lampen and Mr. J. Trounson gave their services as vocalists, and Mr. F. Weekes, R.A.M., as pianist; Mr. John Pardew taking his place as leader of the band of the Private Orchestral Society. Mr. Hele's contributions were a feature in the Concert, and the organ compositions were much applauded. The Guildhall was crowded in every part.

PUDSEY.—The Pudsey and District Sunday School Union Whitsuntide Prize Tune (Competition, 1886) has just been selected, and the following is the Report from the Judge, Mr. S. Wilson:—First Prize, Mr. J. M. Firth, Wortley, near Leeds; Second Prize, Mr. William Briggs, Armley, near Leeds; Third Prize, Mr. S. Walker, Canterbury. The competition has been open to Great Britain and Ireland, and applications received from all parts of the Kingdom. The Judge remarks that all the compositions sent in on this occasion are very superior to those of previous years. The Committee has, therefore, every confidence in recommending them to the attention of schools and choirmasters. They will be ready for sale about Easter, and will be published in both notations.

READING.—The Orpheus Society's first subscribers' night for the present season was given on Wednesday, January 27, at the New Town Hall. The programme was most successful. The vocalists were Miss Mason, R.A.M., Miss B. Brown, F.C.O., who was an able accompanist, also contributed an organ solo. Mr. F. J. Read, Mus. Bac, Conductor to the Society, played with much effect a duet with Mr. Thomas for harp and pianoforte. The part singing was exceedingly good, and the Concert, in every respect, most successful.

RUSHDEN.—An excellent Concert was given by Mr. J. E. Smith, in the new Hall, on the 10th ult., before a large audience. The artists were Miss Mason, R.A.M., Miss B. Brown, F.C.O., Miss Frances Hipwell, and Mr. James Smith, vocalists; Mdlle. Adeline Dinelli (violin), Mr.

Giuseppe Dinelli (violinello), Miss Tirrell, Miss Talley, and Master Alfred Clarke, the last-named young pianist giving a highly credible rendering of Beethoven's "Sonata Pathétique," which was considered "too long" by the audience, some of whom attempted even to drown the sound of the pianoforte. The Concert-giver is to be commended for addressing a reproof to those who thus made their want of musical appreciation conspicuous; but it is indeed a thankless task. Artistically, however, the Concert was a decided success; and we venture to hope that Mr. Smith will persevere in his efforts to raise the taste of Rushden, and disregard the advice tendered him in a local paper to give some "livelier, entertaining music."

SHERBROOKE (P.Q.), CANADA.—The second Concert of the Choral Society took place on January 19, when Cowen's Rose Maiden was performed, under the conductorship of Mr. W. Reed. The solos were well sung by local amateurs, and the choruses rendered throughout with precision and finish. The second part of the programme included part-song, the "Soldiers' Chorus" from Gounod's Faust, "Festival Hymn" by Dudley Buck, several solos, and Beethoven's "Moonlight" Sonata.

SOUTHERN-ON-SEA.—On January 28 an Organ Recital was given in the Wesleyan Chapel by Mr. C. J. C. Boddington, Organist of St. Andrew's Church, Stoke Newington. The selections, which were from the works of Handel, Tours, Bach, Mendelssohn, &c., were well executed and much appreciated by the large audience.

STOCKPORT.—On Monday, the 1st ult., the Musical Society gave a Concert in the Volunteer Armoury; vocalist, Mr. Clifford Hall; solo pianoforte and Conductor, Mr. Joseph Bradley, Mus. Bac., Oxon. The orchestra consisted of forty players, chiefly from Mr. Charles Hall's band. The programme included the Overture to Egmont (Beethoven), Requiem (Mozart), Capriccio for pianoforte and orchestra (Mendelssohn), Overture Fingals Cave (Mendelssohn), solo for pianoforte, Impromptu in A flat (Schubert), and the Overture to Tancrède (Rossini). The entire performance was very satisfactory.

SURBITON.—Mr. R. Sebastian Hart, Organist of St. Andrew's Church, gave his annual Concert in the Lecture Hall, on Tuesday evening, the 16th ult. Mr. Hart was assisted by Miss Woodford and Mr. Iver McKay (vocalists), Mr. Teague (violinello), and the members of the Orchestral Society. Several amateurs also lent valuable aid. The Concert was well attended, and highly successful.

VENTNOR.—Mr. Edwin Lemare gave his annual Concert, at the Assembly Rooms, on the 11th ult., when the Choral Society gave an excellent rendering of Mendelssohn's Hymn of Praise, followed by a selection of vocal and instrumental solos. Madame Clara West, Miss Marie Ridgway, R.A.M., Mr. H. L. Fulkerson, R.A.M., and Mr. Charles Boyd were the principal vocalists. The Rev. G. Jeudwine and Mr. E. H. Lemare, R.A.M., F.C.O., presided at the pianoforte and organ respectively, and Mr. Edwin Lemare conducted.

WARE.—The members of the Musical Society gave their annual Concert on the 2nd ult., conducted by Mr. James L. Gregory, F.C.O. The programme comprised Andersen's The Wreck of the Hesperus and a miscellaneous selection. The solo vocalists were Madame Lita Jarrett and Mr. A. E. Gregory; solo violin, Mr. H. C. Tonking; accompanist, Mr. Malcolm Heywood, A.R.A.M. The hall was crowded.

WESTON-SUPER-MARE.—Mr. C. T. Grinfield, R.A.M., gave an Evening Concert, at the Victoria Hall, on the 2nd ult. The vocalists were Miss Madeleine Kelley, Miss Marie Hayward, Mr. B. Bernard Wilson, and Mr. Thorley Knight; instrumentalists: Signor P. Uricio (euphonium), Mr. C. A. Windeatt (viola), Mr. W. J. Spencer (violinello), Mr. H. L. Jefferies (harmonium), and Mr. C. J. Grinfield (pianist and accompanist). Beethoven's Sonata Pathétique and Haydn's Trio No. 1, in G, for violin, violinello, and piano, were special features in the programme. Miss Hayward responded to a unanimous encore for her finished rendering of F. L. Moir's song "Children asleep"; Miss Kelley gave an artistic reading of Braga's "Serenade," with violin obligato; Mr. Wilson sang Pissini's "Last Watch" with genuine pathos, and Mr. Knight, in Handel's "Honour and Arms" and Mendelssohn's "I am a Roamer," was highly successful. Signor Uricio's solos were well received, and Mr. Grinfield gave an extempore solo with much success.

WORCESTER.—Mr. Spark gave his third and last Concert for the season at the Public Hall, on Thursday evening, January 28. The artists were Miss Carlotta Elliott, Madame Trebelli, Mr. Henry Guy, and Mr. Maybrick, vocalists; M. Hollman, solo violinello; Signor Bisaccia, solo pianoforte and Conductor. A well selected programme was excellently rendered, and the Concert in every respect was most successful.

PASSION SERVICE

FOR THE SEASON OF

LENT AND GOOD FRIDAY,

BY

ALFRED R. GAUL,

COMPOSER OF THE "HOLY CITY," "RUTH," &c.

SHEFFIELD INDEPENDENT.

"Scholarly writing, combined with unmistakable talent, and eminently adapted to the purpose for which it was written and composed, the work will probably be largely used, and Mr. Gaul have to be congratulated upon another success."

MUSICAL STANDARD.

"In this fresh musical product Mr. Gaul has the advantage of an open field, till very recently closed almost entirely to the Anglican Church composer; so that at the outset his work claims the merit of distinctiveness. The text of Mr. Gaul's work, varied and elaborate in structure, is the compilation of the Rev. J. C. Bissard, author at the same time of the original lyrical portions of the work. The course of sacred events connected with the Passion is laid out by the writer so as to form a series of six distinct 'scenes,' the literary construction of these being similar in plan throughout, but each preserving its own separate unity and point of narrative or dramatic interest. The subjects of these divisions, each occupied with a particular stage of the Mystery, are, respectively: 'The traitor at the table,' 'The Denial,' 'The Condemnation before Pilate,' 'The Mockery on Calvary,' 'The Shadow of Death,' and 'The Holy Sepulchre.' Each comprises a prophetic portion (the words selected from those passages of Holy Writ 'foreshadowing' the event), and preceded by a short chorus, which is retained unaltered throughout the work; a narrative portion dealing with the especial event, and what may be termed the lyrical epode, a hymn embodying the subjective reflection on the preceding passages, and in which the whole congregation is supposed to take part. The author has executed the composition and versification with commendable judgment and skill. As regards the composer's share in the work, it must be noted, in the first place, that whilst endeavouring to illustrate in the best manner possible the outward course of the events, the dramatic element, properly so called, has been carefully kept out of the work. Individual characterisation has been avoided by allowing the different solo musical passages to speak in regard to any representative character. This arrangement has no doubt been prompted by judicious reasons, and there is much to be urged in its favour. Mr. Gaul has adopted the arioso style of musical setting for the solo portions of his work. In certain parts, as in the melodious solo 'Blessed are the departed,' the writing approaches the ordinary aria form, but in general the more declamatory style is preserved. There is no imitation of archaic forms in either melodies or harmony, and in the descriptive episodes the composer has not been tempted into theatrical exaggeration in order to secure dramatic effect. The style of the composition, in short, resembles generally that of Mr. Gaul's previous writings—the same effective, grateful part-writing, and the same expressive and melodious treatment of the solo voice. In those sections, notably that of the Unjust Condemnation, where the realistic element is predominant, the composer has manifested his ability to write with dramatic force and intensity as well as with lyric charm. In this respect the choral writing distinguished itself in comparison with that in the 'Holy City' and other of the composer's works. Among the items which impressed us most favourably was the chorus 'The fanning pot is for silver,' the beautiful choral passage 'Watch and pray,' the whole of the choral passages of the Condemnation scene (the original treatment of this scene evades any comparison with the part of the Passion music of other writers); the contralto air 'Oh, hear ye this, all ye people'; the fine chorus 'Consider this, the culminating point of the scene on Calvary; the trio for soprano, tenor, and bass 'Thou hidest Thy face, O Lord'; the quartet 'Hath God forgotten to be gracious'; the strikingly effective chorus 'God is not a man that He should lie'; the solo before mentioned, 'Blessed are the departed,' with its choral appendage (solo quartet); and last, but not least in merit, the fine setting of Adelaide Procter's lines, 'Why should'st thou fear the beautiful angel Death,' full like the poem of a sweet, subdued, delicious calm. Mr. Gaul has not written new hymn-tunes for Mr. Bissard's lyrics; the tunes selected for this occasion were from among those in ordinary congregational use. Altogether considered, Mr. Gaul's new work will undoubtedly greatly enhance his already high reputation in the line of sacred composition. An overflowing congregation testified to the great interest taken in the service. On Saturday evening the work was repeated, the attendance being almost equally large with that of the previous evening."

BIRMINGHAM DAILY MAIL.

"A second experience simply confirms the remark hazarded on the first presentation—viz., that the work is not only the most important Mr. Gaul has yet given to the world of art, but is one that, when familiar, must arrest attention."

Price, paper cover, 2s. 6d.; paper boards, 3s.; scarlet cloth, 4s.

TWELVE VOCAL DUETS FOR SCHOOL USE

Words by EDWARD OXENFORD
MUSIC BY

ALFRED R. GAUL

(Composer of the "Holy City," "Ruth," &c.)

"There are in this series of duets the sweetest things of the kind we have ever met with. No. 4, 'April,' and No. 5, 'May,' are our special favourites, the one being delightfully playful, the other tenderly melodious. Things to be treasured in households where sisters or friends delight in joining voices. The pianoforte accompaniments are well written, and such as an ordinary pianist may successfully undertake."—Birmingham Daily Gazette.

SHORT SETTINGS

OF THE

OFFICE FOR THE HOLY COMMUNION

(INCLUDING BENEDICTUS AND AGNUS DEI)

FOR PAROCHIAL AND GENERAL USE

EDITED BY

GEORGE C. MARTIN.

Price One Shilling each.

Church-music which is modern in form, interesting to a choir, and devotional in effect, whilst also of easy execution and of moderate compass for the voices, is certainly much needed in these days when choral societies are almost universal. This want is especially felt with regard to music for the Office of Holy Communion, and it is hoped that these services will be found well within the capabilities of an ordinary choir, yet not wanting in an effort to give due expression to the solemnity of the words. G. C. M.

THE MUSICAL TIMES

AND SINGING-CLASS CIRCULAR.

APRIL 1, 1886.

LISZT.

WE are upon the eve of an important event in the annals of our musical history—the visit to London, after an absence of forty-five years, of the famous and illustrious pianist and composer, Franz Liszt. It has never been disputed that the English people have always been the foremost to recognise the claims and pretensions of foreign artists of all grades, and the advent of any virtuoso with a big Continental reputation is sure to be hailed with acclamation by lion-hunting amateurs. Cynics may attribute this effusive welcome of greatly-talked-about foreigners to that snobbish element in the national character which “dearly loves a lord”; but we are not cynical, and prefer to place our trust in the tradition of English hospitality. Nothing finer has ever been written, in this regard, than Tennyson’s address to the Princess Alexandra; and the statement that we are “all of us Danes in our welcome of thee, Alexandra,” was simply an echo of the sentiment of the nation. A poet less adroit—or less intensely human—might have cloaked the fact beneath diplomatic diction; but Tennyson goes at it straight, and tells the honest truth at once. Forgetful of the circumstances which may have led to Liszt’s last visit to this country in 1840 proving unprofitable, and even without reference to the growing popularity of his works, as the catholicity of artistic tastes advances, we are all of us Hungarians in our greeting of this most extraordinary man. That he long has been a power in music is incontestable, and that his personal influence, no less than his artistic gifts, has drawn towards him a vast number of musicians, is no less indisputable. The grandest boast of a pianist to-day is to advertise himself or herself, as the case may be, as a “pupil of Liszt.” This mere fact is pregnant with meaning; a whole volume might be devoted to the subject, and yet speak with feebler argument.

It must be a grand thing for a man to be able to look back upon such a career as that which Franz Liszt has enjoyed—to review the past, since the time when, as a ten-year-old pianoforte-player, he received Beethoven’s kisses, to the moment when he knew himself as the greatest exponent of his art of his own or any other period. With what pride must he now consider that this altitude, won by his own talents, belongs to him at this very moment. If there were held a plebiscite throughout the world, to determine who is the greatest living pianist, the unanimous vote would proclaim Liszt the foremost of all. And yet it is only a very chosen few who have heard the Hungarian master play since his voluntary retirement from the concert platform. That he will be persuaded, during his temporary sojourn with us, to break through this rule of reticence is unlikely—indeed, it would be both unreasonable and unjust to seek to make him do so. What would he have to gain by pandering to the tastes of the curious few? Nothing. The laurels won in his prime, be sure, are jealously guarded; and what can a man so ripe in years seek to gain more? The gratification of the few, at the possible expense of the feelings of the discriminating many, would be distinctly regrettable. We do not suggest that Liszt has lost any of his juvenile fire or energy, but the principle which leads many artists to attempt fresh triumphs late in life is not founded either on good taste or judgment. When Grisi essayed the part of Lucrezia Borgia at the old Her Majesty’s Theatre, on the eve of its destruction, did she increase or imperil her former reputation? Liszt will do well simply to remain with us as a guest; not to pay for his reception by giving an entertainment. His present visit should be merely a triumphal procession, and he should find his path plentifully strewn with flowers. Already several fêtes have been organised in his honour. At Mr. Henry Littleton’s a grand reception has been arranged; Mr. Walter Bache, Liszt’s devoted pupil and admirer, holds a soirée at the Grosvenor Gallery, to which all the notabilities of musical London have been invited to meet the Hungarian master; the performance of “Saint Elizabeth,” at St. James’s Hall, by the Novello Choir, under the direction of Mr. A. C. Mackenzie—himself a noted adherent of Liszt—will be graced by the presence of the author; on the following day, Dr. Henry Wyld will perform the same work, with the assistance of the students of the London Academy of Music; and the Chev. Emil Bach will also give an important Liszt Concert. There need be no apprehension lest the music which the Hungarian composer-pianist has written should be forgotten. Once up in the air the name of Liszt will not be suffered to drop; it will be another case of “Figaro quâ, Figaro là, Figaro sù, Figaro giù”—only Figaro will be spelt another way.

Let us take a bird’s-eye view, as it were, of Liszt’s life and achievements. He was born at Raiding, in Hungary, October 22, 1811, and at twelve years of age he made his first public appearance in Vienna, when Beethoven was so effusively polite to the young genius. In Vienna he studied under Salieri and Czerny, and already showed his capacity as a creative, as well as an executive, musician, by furnishing one of the variations on a waltz theme by Diabelli, to which fifty were added by contemporaneous musicians. Beethoven was invited to write one variation for this work, but the iron entered into his soul, and he wrote thirty-three! The entire number, under the name of “Vaterländische Künstler-Verein,” were published the same year (1823). From Vienna Liszt proceeded to Paris, intending to study at the Conservatoire; but Cherubini, then in power, would not admit the young alien, who accordingly pursued his studies under Paër and Reicha. A one-act opéra, “Don Sanche,” was brought out at the Académie Royal in 1825—not a bad opening for a lad of fourteen. History is silent as to what ultimately became of this work. When only sixteen years of age, Liszt lost his father, and apparently had to support both himself and his mother. Then came tours innumerable, and concerts in which the fame—rapidly spreading—of the young virtuoso was fully maintained. In London he played Hummel’s Concerto, in May, 1827; and three years later performed Weber’s Concertstück and (with Ole Bull) the Kreutzer Sonata of Beethoven. It is said that this last English engagement was disastrous to the artist, that no less a deficit than £6,000 appeared on the agent’s books; but Liszt, with characteristic complacency and good nature, bade the agent not to mind, that he himself would make up the difference. To the honour of the man, let it be recorded, that this was no empty vaunt. But the records of Liszt’s generosity are legion. It was he who devoted the proceeds of several Concerts to the distress caused at Pesth by the inundation of the Danube in 1837, and to his liberality was primarily due the completion of the Beethoven monument at Bonn.

But now we have to regard Liszt in another light—as an orchestral conductor and producer of operatic works. When he accepted the post of Conductor at Weimar (Court Theatre) he did so with the intention of concentrating his influence and interest upon the fortunes of unrecognised musicians. The early works of Wagner fell in his way, and the reception they met with at the hands of the great-hearted chef d'orchestre can only be recorded in his own words. When, on account of his political principles, Wagner was proscribed and forced to fly from Germany, he writes:—"The very day when my personal danger became a certainty, I saw Liszt conducting a rehearsal of my 'Tannhäuser,' and was astonished at recognising my second self in his achievement. What I had felt in inventing this music he felt in performing it; what I wanted to express in writing it down, he expressed in making it sound." Continuing, Wagner writes:—"At the end of my last stay at Paris, when ill, miserable, and despairing, I sat brooding over my fate, my eye fell on the score of my 'Lohengrin,' which I had totally forgotten. Suddenly I felt something like compassion that this music should never sound from off the death-pale paper. Two words I wrote to Liszt, and his answer was that preparations for the performance were being made on the largest scale that the limited means at Weimar would permit." And thus the world became the richer by "Tannhäuser" and "Lohengrin," through a hard-working and sympathetic conductor, living in remote Weimar! We do not say that the world's gain has been excessive; but the two works are additions to the lyric stage about which the world would not like to be silent. After a period of wonderful activity, Liszt resigned the Court Directorship in 1859, and since then has not resumed his intimacy with public life. In his journey to London, this year, Liszt took Paris en route, and no doubt renewed the friendships of years gone by. That he has been "lionised" by the excitable Parisian public goes without saying. On the 26th ult. his "Graner Messe" was given in the church of St. Eustache, M. Colonne directing an orchestra and chorus of four hundred. The performance was given for the benefit of the Catholic Schools of the Second Arrondissement, which circumstance will perhaps reconcile us insulars to the fact that tickets had been at a fabulous price for days in advance. The "Graner Messe" was written for the inauguration, thirty years since, of the church of Gran, in Hungary.

Altogether, it is a very amazing figure which will be presented to our gaze in a very short time. Premier pianist—an honour universally accorded—pioneer of the "music of the future," and composer of almost countless works—some creative, others redistributive—Franz Liszt stands at this moment a fit subject for hero-worship. Whatever he has done, he has done with a whole heart, and the tale of his charities will mingle in the mind of the listener with the sounds of the music emanating from the soul of a devout man and a great musician. Let the cry of the English people to Liszt be "Ave!"

"ST. ELIZABETH."

THE CRUSADERS.

THE chorus with which this section of the work opens (Allegro impetuoso, B flat) is largely built upon the ecclesiastical progression "symbolical of the Cross":—

which so many classical masters—Mozart and Mendelssohn included—have employed. The use made of it when the voices enter may here be shown—

This is the key to the chorus as a whole, but attention should be given to other features; among them the independent March rhythm of the orchestra, which is very conspicuous and an important aid to the effect sought by the composer.

The words in which the departing Landgrave calls upon his people for allegiance to the wife he leaves behind are set to music sufficiently definite to speak for itself. It contains a reference to the Elizabeth theme, after the line, "To leave my loved ones here alone." The orchestral march in the preceding chorus is also drawn upon. The short chorus in reply is chiefly noticeable for a phrase borrowed from the Hungarian national air.—

The farewell scene now entered upon is almost wholly taken up by Elizabeth's passionate appeal to her lord. This begins with a Lento movement, "O tarry! O shorten not the hour," in which intense and anguished expression is sought by free use of chromatic melody and harmony. An ascending sequence is here very noticeable—

An Allegro agitato assai (B major) follows, on the words "With grief my spirit wrestles," in which the voice part has a simpler character, the effect of agitation and distress coming from quickened movement and the nature of the orchestration, especially the surging of the basses through a portion of the chromatic scale. The solo opens thus—

Upon the leavetaking of husband and wife, the strains of the waiting soldiers now intrude again and again, but as the music is that which opened the scene, remarks upon it are unnecessary. Besides, it cannot distract regard from the principal characters, to whose situation it gives strength and significance.

The chief division of the March and Chorus that terminate the scene is based upon the Gregorian intonation, which will at once be discerned in the leading theme (Allegro risoluto)—

No. 42. Strings.

This is at first lightly scored, but orchestral power increases as the March goes on, till a climax is reached upon a tributary theme—one of several that need not be more particularly indicated.

The subject of the Trio (un poco meno mosso, E major) is said to be derived from an old Pilgrims' song, supposed to date from the time of the Crusaders. Thus it runs—

No. 44. Wind.

It is at a resumption of the foregoing (in B flat) that the voices enter, developing great masses of harmony. Soon, however, material is drawn from the main body of the March, the Gregorian intonation again predominating, and thus an advance is made to a strenuous and stirring climax, in which the composer makes use of every possible contributory to sonorous effect. Thus the first part of the work ends.

At the beginning of the second Part, the evil genius of the drama comes upon the scene. What it is that occupies her thoughts the music tells us at once, the clarinet leading off with another version of the Elizabeth theme—

Clar.

This soon changes to an Allegro agitato assai, in which figures most conspicuously another Leitmotif— aptly expressing the fierce determination of the Landgravine to expel her daughter-in-law from her home. Subsequently, indeed, we find it given in this connection—with a syncopated string accompaniment. All that follows is in keeping with its peculiar mode of progression. Take the following as a case in point—

Its significance throughout the dialogue now entered upon is at once appreciated in hearing, especially as no other musical feature calls for remark.

Acquainted with the fate in store for her, the Hungarian princess breaks forth into lamentation, the musical expression of which is marked by abundant use of chromatic melody. The principal phrase of her first solo is heard throughout an orchestral introduction, and then from the voice—

No. 49.

Sophie sternly answers, "Decided is thy fate," her representative theme being in close attendance. Indeed, the music to the entire dialogue of the women is made up of representative themes. For instance, when Elizabeth proudly asserts her royal descent, the Hungarian national air is heard—

No. 50.

while a reference to herself—"Shall I forsake what yet remains?"—evokes her own motif, by this time so familiar. That theme in full (see Ex. 1) accompanies her entreaty, "O grant the only prayer I ask," and, with the motif of the Landgravine and of Elizabeth's appeal, carries on the scene to the end of a short concerted episode for the two women and the Seneschal. The part of the man in this trio is remarkable as being an instance of well nigh pure diatonic melody—and as widely contrasting with its thematic surroundings. Elizabeth's following solo, "Thou, too, art a mother," brings relief from the all-pervading motives with its short broad phrases and tremulous orchestral harmonies—

No. 51.

No. 52.

while Sophie's stern reply, to the music of her theme (unaccompanied)— is an effective dramatic stroke. Then again we hear the motif of Elizabeth's lament, followed by the despairing cry—

No. 53.

No. 54. Here is the voice of com-pas-sion

The Princess's invocation, "Thou house, for all thy happy hours," makes further use of the Elizabeth theme, and at last that of her complaint—

The stream of weep-ing stills my sor-row, brings the painful scene to an end. In the foregoing remarks attention has mainly been given to thematic points, wherein the chief interest lies, but much might be said regarding the composer's harmonic method and his orchestration. It is not possible, however, to set forth within reasonable limits characteristics that demand a good deal of exposition.

STORM.

This is an extended movement (Allegro moderato e maestoso) in which, though vocal solos are interspersed, the orchestra plays the principal part. But it is no more independent of representative themes than the preceding dialogue, while in varying these the composer is as ingenious as ever. He begins with the Hungarian air—follows on with the Elizabeth motif—and that of Sophie—

Large use is also made of a phrase already familiar in the music of the Landgravine—

But as the storm gathers power, these are swept from the orchestra. In performance, the rest speaks loudly enough for itself, while in analysis, like most music of the kind, it claims the privilege of securing a realistic effect by any means. At the close of the storm—there is no occasion to dwell upon the incidental solos—the Elizabeth theme is once more heard, now given out by oboes and English horn—

Upon this the music gradually dies away.

The section entitled "Elizabeth" opens with an extended soprano solo, most of which is in the unusual key of F sharp major. Its vocal part illustrates the composer's frequent method by being more of a declamatory than cantabile character. This arises, to some extent, from the assiduous display of the Elizabeth theme in the orchestra and the consequent interjection of short vocal phrases which do not interfere with it. Nevertheless the solo is adorned by not a few purely melodious passages for the voice. Such is the following, obviously based upon the motif just named—

No. 61.

I call to mind the hours When thou and I, my love, Pluck'd which motif, indeed, constitutes the foundation of the whole piece up to the point where the mind of the Princess goes back to the home of her youth. Here the Hungarian air naturally takes precedence—

No. 62.

O childhood's dream Reand gives the remainder of the solo its chief thematic character. To follow it in hearing is to keep a clue through a maze of accessory matter, having as its not least formidable part ever-shifting chromatic harmony. The solo is followed by a long postlude, offering no very salient feature for remark, save, perhaps, its final transition to the dominant of G. This appears sufficiently striking—

No. 63.

Strings.

The poor, among whom the outcast Princess now lives, praise her works of mercy in a chorus (Andante moderato) taking its principal theme from the Kirchenlied mentioned in Mr. Barry's preface. This subject appears, with broken phrases, in the orchestral introduction, but is given complete by the voices, as thus—

No. 64. molto marc.

The continuation of this is carried on by the sopranos and altos separately; the quaint style of the old tune being imitated with success. For instance, the first sopranos have the following—

No. 65. Thou hast re-fresh'd the thirst-ing ones with wine the second sopranos answering—

No. 66.

while orchestral interludes keep up the connection with the original melody. All the voices join on the lines "And him o'er whom the death-angel passed; Him didst thou gently lay to rest at last." The music here is very simple, but in simplicity lies some of its effect—

No. 67.

After a short solo for Elizabeth, "O take what yet to me remaineth," comes an ensemble; "Elizabeth, thou holy one!" for chorus and solo soprano. This too, if not built upon the Kirchenlied, is attended by it; and includes one of its phrases in a vocal unison. The most salient feature of the ensemble is a passage for unaccompanied chorus, which pays due regard to the somewhat archaic character of the whole section—

No. 68.

DEATH OF ELIZABETH.

The scene of Elizabeth's death in the odour of sanctity is not prolonged, being limited to a soprano solo, founded upon the heroine's theme, which we hear from the violins after a quasi-recitative: "This is no earthly night." It is accompanied by a hitherto silent harp—and waits upon the voice without cessation; the choral theme and a part of the second Elizabeth phrase—being also largely used for this purpose. The saint's last words should be quoted not only for the pathos of their music, but because the phrases, one of which belongs to the Elizabeth theme, are afterwards introduced—

No. 71.

This is followed by an orchestral passage which substantially reproduces that coming after Elizabeth's Prayer.

CHORUS OF ANGELS.

The composer directs the angelic music that directly follows the saint's death to be sung by a semi-chorus or three solo voices. It begins with an introduction in three parts, unaccompanied. Observe the effect of the last chord, without its third—

No. 72. poco rit. pp

A - while the . . bo - dy rests in night.

This leads to a passage in F sharp major, accompanied by a harmonium only; the instrument being placed, according to a special instruction, "in the midst of the singers." Its function is simply to double the voice parts—

No. 73.

The semi-chorus next repeats with modifications the passage shown in Ex. 68 above, after which a full chorus of female voices, in three parts, is entered upon, accompanied by strings (trem.), woodwind, horns, harp, and harmonium. Here the passage, modified from that shown in Ex. 68, occurs again, but attention is chiefly due to some bold and striking progressions in the earlier bars. Take the following as examples—

No. 74. Molto tranquillo.

All grief is o'er, And joy vic-tor-ious, &c.
A-while the bo - dy rests in night.

The number ends with a ritornello in which an ethereal effect is sought by harp passages, attended only by sustained pianissimo chords for the violins, violas, and celli.

SOLEMN INTERMENT OF ELIZABETH.

An orchestral movement of considerable dimensions precludes the solemn function which forms the business of the last scene. Described as a "Recapitulation of leading themes," it may be intended to suggest a review of the dead saint's history; just as, in the Dead March for Siegfried, Wagner wonderfully brings before us the whole story of that hero. After four bars, occupied by a funeral bell and drums, we hear the Kirchenlied—

No. 75.

This supplies matter for a short introduction (Andante maestoso, E minor), and then the main movement (Quasi-Allegro moderato, E major) is entered upon fortissimo by the entire orchestra. It deals first with the Elizabeth theme, now given out with all possible pomp and circumstance, as though glorified—

No. 76.

Next occurs a phrase—

No. 77. Vins.

which seems to be a graceful variation upon the opening notes of the Kirchenlied, after which the opening notes in question are associated with a reference to the Crusaders' March—

No. 78. Marcato.

Presently comes a change of key to B major, and the Hungarian air is introduced—

No. 79.

Another change, to E flat, and we have the Pilgrims' Song—

No. 80.

Now the tale of themes is complete, and the rest of the movement can be followed for itself rather than for what it is supposed to represent. The Interlude ends with an Andante, having as its chief feature a fragment of the Elizabeth motif. With regard to the whole number, its rich and varied orchestration is undoubtedly in Liszt's best manner.

In the course of the solo forming the Emperor's address, "I see assembled round the throne," the orchestra makes several references which will instantly be recognised. In these the Crusaders' March is included, and likewise the Kirchenlied, the last-named eventually having the field to itself and forming the link between the address and the chorus following.

The Chorus of People, "Mid tears and solemn mourning," is accompanied at the outset by fragments of the Kirchenlied. Its vocal structure, like that of many other numbers, presents unusual variety. At first it is antiphonal, the female choir answering the male—and, next, it reverts to a subject heard in the Death scene—

The Crusaders enter, as may be supposed, to the strains of their now familiar March, upon which the first part of their chorus, "O Thou, whose life-blood streamed," is superimposed. Nothing in this part of the scene calls for particular comment.

The archaism of Church music succeeds to the sympathetic utterances of the crowd and the pomp of military strains. First of all come the Choristers, singing in unison, unaccompanied save by the organ, another version of the Elizabeth theme—

No. 84. Unis.

They soon break into harmony—chords in the naked simplicity of a bare fifth—and so quickly end. Next the Hungarian Bishops are heard in passages of a like character, the German Bishops following, with a fragment of the Elizabeth motif—in attendance upon their words.

This leads to an ensemble in the nature of a hymn, "Tu, pro nobis, mater pia," simply harmonised, and accompanied by full orchestra and organ. It opens with the Elizabeth theme, almost as a matter of course—and in this fashion, broad and imposing, continues till the Coda "Amen" is reached. Here the voices have partly unison phrases, while below them the orchestral basses iterate and reiterate a fragment—of the motif which, as it began the work, now ends it.

By F. CORDER.

IV.

9. "OVERTURE and Incidental Music to Goethe's Faust." By P. J. von Lindpaintner.

Peter Joseph von Lindpaintner (1791—1856) was a sound and steady musician of the Weber school. His compositions, like those of Marschner, Reissiger, Spohr, and others, were once much admired, and have only been pushed out of notice by the crowd of new aspirants to fame, who claim all the available space in modern programmes as their just right. We have no information as to the scope of his "Faust" music, and as the Overture only is published, it is to that we will confine our attention. It is now being played before Mr. Wills's "Faust" at the Lyceum, but of course a theatre band is too weak in the matter of strings to give a fair idea of it. It is one of those bustling, energetic overtures, with fine work for the first violins, such as the composers of this school were famous for, and a quotation of the opening bars will give an idea of its general character:—

No. 7. Allegretto presto.

Vin.

The construction is quite orthodox, and calls for no comment. There is nothing in this bright and vigorous piece of orchestral writing that seems more appropriate to "Faust" than to "Julius Cæsar," or any other heroic play, but we must not be hard on the composer for thus failing where no one else can be said to have succeeded.

10. "Overture and Incidental Music to Goethe's Faust." By Julius Rietz.

Mere mention of this work must suffice, it being unpublished. The composer (born, 1812; died, 1877) will be familiar by name to most of our readers as the intimate friend of Mendelssohn. A distinguished violoncellist, a profoundly scholarly musician, and one of the most eminent of all conductors, he yet never took high rank as a composer, though he wrote a good deal in all departments. His name will chiefly live as a conscientious editor of classical works for Breitkopf and Härtel, the Bach and Handel Societies, &c.

We must here acknowledge our indebtedness to a correspondent who reminds us that one work of some importance has been omitted from our list. This is "Scenes from Goethe's Faust, set to music by Henry Litolf (Op. 103). Dedicated to his Highness the reigning Duke of Saxe-Coburg Gotha." Date 185-. There are three of these scenes published: Scene 1, Faust's Study; Scene 2, Before the City Gates; and Scene 7, Gretchen in the church. They are for voices and orchestra, and are published (by the composer's firm) in full score. Their claim to notice is the singularity of the treatment, the scenes being not intended for stage use but as concert pieces like those of Schumann, soon to be mentioned. Thus the first scene opens with a few bars of slow introduction for the orchestra, which suddenly ceases and Faust's first twelve lines are spoken, not sung, by a reader. A few more bars from the orchestra and another eight lines are read, again the same, and the speech finishes accompanied by a tremolando chord. Next follows a long movement for orchestra Presto agitato, which is very animated in character, but the subject-matter of which consists of the merest shreds, chiefly rhythmical figures rather than phrases, such as the following—the two quavers and dotted minim of the third bar being especially persistent. This does not seem very brilliant material for an orchestral piece, but in an extended quick movement the separate phrases form but a slight criterion of the whole. This interlude at last fades away in long sustained chords, and the reciter resumes Faust's invocation to the Spirit, now speaking through music. The same phrases here reappear more disjointedly with—in one place—very strange instrumentation, including tremolando passages for flutes and clarinets and a roll on a single suspended cymbal. Throughout the orchestration shows an exceptionally firm hand. The Spirit sings in severely monotonous recitative, Faust continuing to speak only. On the former's disappearance the wild orchestral Presto is resumed and repeated entire, ending at the point where Faust is about to quaff the poison. Here the harp suddenly enters, accompanying the celestial Easter Hymn which is effectively set as it stands in the poem, that is, without curtailment. The character of this movement is excellent, but the themes are a trifle dry. The same remark applies to the whole of Litloff's work. The second scene comprises, of course, the Beggars' song, Soldiers' chorus, and Peasants' dance. There is an orchestral introduction of some length, pastoral in character, founded on the following phrases worked separately and together—

No. 9.

The Peasants' song and dance are also made up of but two simple phrases, repeated in every possible shape—

No. 10.

After this gay and spirited movement the opening pastorale is resumed, and worked out as before. The third scene strikes us as the best, being the terrible dialogue between Gretchen and the accusing demon, ever and anon interrupted by the sinister strains of the "Dies iræ." The "Judex ergo cum sedebit" is set as a very impressive fugue of considerable difficulty. The parts of Gretchen and the Evil Spirit are sung by soprano and baritone, as in Schumann. There are no extraneous orchestral interludes, so this scene might almost serve for stage purposes. The work, as a whole, has interest enough, if only in the orchestration, to make one desirous of hearing it, but it is scarcely likely ever to be performed in England.

II. "Scenes from Goethe's Faust." By Robert Schumann.

This is a work of similar scope to the last—i.e., a setting of Goethe's text for Concert performance—but how different! A work which throws all other "Faust" music, even the best, utterly into the shade—a work, one portion of which must stand for ever as its composer's masterpiece, unapproached in beauty and poetic feeling, a noble monument to the great poet. As an independent work of art, its value is, of course, diminished by its fragmentary shape, a few scenes only from various parts of the poem being set, though this drawback is not so much felt in Germany as in England, where Goethe's "Faust" is comparatively unfamiliar. A more serious drawback is the fact that while the concluding portions were penned between 1843 and 1848, Schumann's brightest and best period, the first two parts show unmistakable traces of the mental decadence which clouded his later years. The profound melancholy gloom which pervades the Overture especially is characteristic of all Schumann's last works, which also are nearly all in the key of D minor. The mournfulness is by no means unsuited to the subject here, and though in some respects a weak work, Schumann's Overture seems more worthy of its theme than any other we are acquainted with, even Wagner's. The principal subject—has always seemed to us singularly expressive of the restless striving of Faust's spirit, and derives additional pathos from appearing to be also the reflection of the composer's suffering mind. In the Garden scene, as in other parts, Schumann has set portions of the text not intended by the poet for music, but this is no crime. The charming dialogue when Gretchen plucks the flower leaves for an oracle seems to yearn for musical expression, and though Schumann is by no means at his best, the character of the scene is poetic in the extreme. The same may be said of the two following scenes, "Gretchen before the shrine" and "Gretchen in the church." Schumann's fountain of melody seems to have sadly dwindled, his means of expression are limited, and his music seems to breathe absolute mortal anguish of mind; but this very fact gives just the colouring that is required for these two scenes. The scene in the church has been set pretty much as it stands by several composers, but Schumann alone has really risen to the height of the situation. The misery of Gretchen, the terrific denunciations of the Evil Spirit, and the solemn awfulness of the "Dies iræ" are here given, not with the superficial brilliance of Gounod, the dry scholasticism of Litloff, or the ambitious diffuseness of Prince Radziwill, but with a poetic power all Schumann's own. Part II., consisting of three scenes from the second part of "Faust," cannot be praised so highly; the lack of inspiration is sometimes painfully evident, and there is too little variety. The opening scene of Goethe's second part, with Avril and the sylphs, which is so exquisitely lyrical, has not been set satisfactorily by either Schumann, Pierson, or Lassen. The first is too gloomy, the second too vague, and the third too superficial. The next scene—that between Faust and the four grey women—is hardly one which lends itself to effective musical treatment, but the general character is weird and grotesque. That which follows is the scene of Faust's death, which is set as it stands up to the exclamation of Mephistopheles and the Lemurs, "The index falls! the end is reached!" thus omitting the supernatural strife for possession of Faust's soul. We confess to finding this number absolutely uninteresting; it sounds like an endless series of chords and nothing else. The contrast between this second and the third part—which is a setting of Goethe's Epilogue—is so violent as to afford a complete answer to those critics who, whenever the last portion is performed, complain of having the work "mutilated." As a matter of fact, Schumann never intended the work to be performed as a whole, for it has neither unity nor completeness. This marvellous setting of Faust's Salvation is, besides being one of the most poetical things in all music, a perfect stream of simple tunes in Schumann's best vein. From the opening chorus of Anchorites to the final prodigious Chorus Mysticus all is glorious melody. If, as a London critic lamented on its first performance, Schumann has not made Goethe's meaning any more clear by his music, he has at any rate given this part of the poem an interest in the minds of thousands on whom it would otherwise have made scant impression. The song of the Seraphs—

the Angels' chorus, the beautiful solo of Dr. Marianus (Faust), which reminds one faintly of Schubert—

these and many other strains are not only beautiful in themselves but are perfectly satisfactory regarded as settings of the poetry. If the words are in some places repeated rather often we can bear to dwell on such profound utterances and can all the more easily persuade ourselves that we understand them. The magnificent Finale has two settings, the opening portion of twenty-eight bars being the same for both. The first and shorter version is generally performed, but the second is also extremely fine. It is more polyphonic and with freer and bolder part-writing for the voices than the former, which like most of Schumann's choral music, runs the risk of tiring the ear by its perpetual full chords. One lingers over these pages with such unalloyed pleasure that it is quite a painful wrench to lay aside the score and turn to—

12. "Music to the second part of Goethe's Faust." By H. H. Pierson.

Henry Hugh Pearson, or Henri Hugo Pierson, as he afterwards Germanized his name, is, perhaps, of all English musicians the one whose works are least known and appreciated in his own country. How is this? Nothing more simple. Having the ill-luck to live just at the time when musical art was at its worst in England (he was born in 1815, and died in 1872), and being gifted with a talent of that refined kind which rather shuns than desires the recognition of the general public he abandoned his native country and settled in Germany, consequently, the Oratorio "Jerusalem," and a few part-songs and solo songs, are all the works of his which have been published in England. It is, however, only fair to the British public to add that Pierson's larger works are all so bizarre, and unlike those of any other composer, that it is small matter for wonder if they have failed to secure recognition on the few occasions of their performance. We hope at a future time to find an opportunity of saying more about this remarkable composer—at present our business is with his "Faust" music.

As the art-critic who has succeeded in grasping the principles of Rossetti and Burne-Jones feels when confronted by the "Symphonies" of Whistler, so does the musician who has mastered the intricacies of Wagner, Liszt, and Berlioz feel when he encounters the music of such men as Pierson and Dräsecke. He cannot, like the general reader, impatiently toss it aside with the epithet, "Mad, incomprehensible stuff!" but he pores over it again and again, vainly hoping that familiarity will throw light upon the obscurity which enshrouds the principles upon which these men worked. Some critics will finally believe that they have no principles whatever, but surely that is too superficial a judgment. The ordinary schoolboy, who knows the first laws of algebra and trigonometry, might say the same on dipping into the infinitesimal calculus. It is impossible that men who have had a complete musical education, have won honours and distinctions in the same lines as others, should, when they compose original works, proceed without plan or method. Yet truth obliges us to confess that the portions of Pierson's "Faust" music which are in the slightest degree intelligible, as regards design and theme, are but few and far between. Phrases appear and disappear, have no counterpart or continuation, and are rarely heard a second time. The rhythm and the time change now and again without comprehensible object, the music goes on as long as it likes and might leave off anywhere with equal effect. Yet in writing these objections we cannot but remember that the same complaints have been urged against Wagner, Schumann, Beethoven, and even Mozart. Only the men who have made such strictures have usually been the superficial critics who disdain to study great works. On the most intimate acquaintance with Pierson's Overture to the second part of "Faust" we have utterly failed to grasp the composer's drift or intention, even as regards the mere general character of the piece. The opening phrase—

reappears indeed in different shapes, but that is all. Snatches from other portions of the work may be discovered, but these are the merest ghosts of ideas. The nearest approach to a melody is found just at the end, a quotation from the Angels' Chorus, "Roses that bloom for us," which Schumann has set so deliciously—

No. 15.

The arpeggio bass here makes us think we are going to have a rhythmical melody, but it goes no further than our quotation extends, and after a second repetition is no more alluded to. And yet, unmeaning as this music seems to be, one cannot divest oneself of the idea that there is something in it, if one could only discover what. Unlike some composers, Pierson does not avail himself of the resources of modern harmony to conceal the absence of ideas under a stream of modulations; his harmonic progressions are in the most sober taste. But the mind fails to receive many of his musical ideas as such, which induces a doubt, in the unprejudiced critic, whether the fault is not his own. This doubt is increased when he finds in other parts of the work things which he can cordially approve, though even at the best his enjoyment is checked by the feeling of complete strangeness which characterises the music. To analyse each separate piece might be interesting, but so many numbers refuse to lend themselves to analysis, that we must confine ourselves to the more prominent ones, merely making general remarks on the rest. The vocal score of this "Faust" music is published by Schott and Co., and bears a dedication to the late King of Belgium, Leopold I., also a note stating that the second part of "Faust" was first produced at the Hamburg Stadt-Theater, adapted for the stage by Dr. Wollheim, and accompanied by this music on March 25, 1854. Pierson's music was repeatedly performed, and obtained for its composer the Gold Medal for Art and Science, awarded by the above-mentioned monarch. It has since been played in many other parts of Germany on the rare occasions on which the second part of "Faust" has been produced. Critics have delivered the most widely different opinions on it, some declaring that Pierson will be understood and esteemed when Beethoven and Wagner are forgotten, and others retorting "Yes; but not till then!" For ourselves, we are inclined to imitate the frankness of a certain local critic, who, on a recent performance of Bach's "Christ-mas" Oratorio in Dullborough, honestly declared that the work was utterly beyond him, and refused to criticise it. The vocal score of Pierson's "Faust" music is arranged with little attention to practicality. Many of the numbers, even simple ones, are needlessly arranged for four hands, sometimes printed on opposite pages, and sometimes not. Others again have an accompaniment for piano, with violin and cello obbligato, the string parts having no discernible raison d'être whatever. The most comprehensible portions are Nos. 11, Introduction to the 3rd Act; 12, Chorus of Grecian women; 16, Pastoral Intermezzo (the scene in Arcadia); 20, Chorus "Heilige Poesie"; and 26, the Song of Lynceus, the warder on the ramparts of Faust's castle. There are thirty-nine numbers altogether, many being short bits of melodrame like the following, for example—which is perhaps as good a specimen as we can give of Pierson's obscure style. These bars accompany the exit of Faust when Care has breathed upon him and rendered him blind. The music will be noticed as ending upon the last beat of the bar, a rare thing in other composers, but an almost invariable occurrence with Pierson. It would seem to show a defective sense of rhythm, and, indeed, rhythm is our composer's weak point, as it is with many modern musicians. No. 11 is a very pretty little entr'acte in 9-8 time, which exasperatingly breaks off into vagueness just before the end, as the curtain rises and Helen enters with the Trojan captives. No. 12 is a chorus of Trojan women, which is clear in theme and form, and has a certain classic dignity. In the pastoral Intermezzo, No. 16, we also find strains which fall naturally and smoothly on the ear, and the Hymn to Poetry (No. 20) is very broad and noble in character, though the actual musical material does not strike us as being of high value. We must here remark upon the extraordinarily free English translation (whose we know not) which accompanies the text, and which, though far from resembling the ordinary doggerel of libretti, makes no attempt at reproducing Goethe's language or ideas. The present number runs thus:—

Heilige Poesie
Himmel an steige sie
Glänze, der schönste Stern
Fern und so w-iter fern!
Und sie erreicht uns doch
Immer, man hört sie noch
Vernimmt sie gern.

Sound, immortal harp,
Over Time's dreary waves,
Temper all human ills,
Lyre of celestial tone,
Let thy enchanting spell
Dark clouds of grief dispel.
Sad were our lot on earth,
Sad, bereft of thee,
Conquer, sweet Poesy,
Baneful Misfortune's power,
And with triumphant voice
Call forth inspiring joys
Of heavenly birth, &c., &c.

The only solo song, that of Lynceus, the warder, is very natural and smooth. Pierson has indeed written charming songs, few of which have any tendency to vagueness. With this number our commendation stops. The music to the last scenes, the choruses of Anchorites, Angels, and Seraphs are absolutely unintelligible; they may be works of genius—we cannot say for certain that they are not; but our comprehension acknowledges itself unequal to the task of assimilating them. We take leave of this perplexing work, advising the jaded critic in search of a new musical sensation to spend a few leisure weeks (or months) over Pierson's "Faust" music.

THE GREAT COMPOSERS

By JOSEPH BENNETT.

No. XVII.—SCHUBERT (continued from page 133).

THE year 1819 saw Schubert enjoying himself, for the first time, as a tourist. Some of his biographers declare that he had saved up money for this purpose, but we must be permitted to doubt their statement. In the first place, the composer rarely earned more than a bare subsistence; in the second place, his convivial habit, indeed, his entire character, was opposed to the idea of hoarding cash for any purpose whatever. As to the particular fact in question, probably his travelling companion, Heinrich Vogl, could have spoken very positively. He, no doubt, carried the common purse and contributed thereto in proportion to the excess of his means over those of the poor composer. Schubert's delight when setting out upon this trip to the mountainous district of Upper Austria must have been very great. He was literally an untravelled man, knowing, of all the wide world, only the district around Vienna and the road to Esterhazy's place in Hungary. A new life opened to him, therefore, the joys of which his artist-soul drank in greedily as scene after scene of natural beauty unfolded itself. The destination of the two friends was principally Steyr—a manufacturing town on the road from Linz to Gratz, sometimes known as the "Austrian Sheffield." Steyr, which contains now but little over 11,000 inhabitants, must have been much smaller sixty years ago, but its pretty situation and interesting surroundings remain unchanged. From the town a score of delightful excursions may be made, and anybody who does not object to the propinquity of ironworks may spend a "good time" in the old Styrian burgh. Schubert undoubtedly had such a time, for his friend Vogl was well known there, and introduced him to some excellent people, who were very proud to receive the young composer into their circle and do him honour. The names of some of these worthies have come down to us. At the head of them stands Herr Silvester Paumgartner, house-owner in Steyr, something in the iron way perhaps—certainly "deputy-factor to the head-guild"—and, no doubt, a very solid and respectable citizen. Paumgartner could play the violoncello a little, but his musical enthusiasm far outran his executive ability. He kept open house for artists, and was ready with board, bed, and purse whenever either or all were needed. The excellent deputy-factor, in truth, lavished upon music and musicians the sympathy that would have been shared by wife and children had he not remained a bachelor. He collected instruments, moreover, and took pride in augmenting his library, often walking to Strengberg to intercept the Paris Courier and give him commissions for new books. Besides Paumgartner, there was Herr Josef von Koller, merchant and ironmonger, who had a daughter, familiarly called "Pepi." Pepi could play the piano, and knew how to use the soprano voice with which nature had endowed her. "Frizi" Dornfeld also figures among the young lady friends of the two tourists, who were promptly quartered upon the hospitable Styrians with a special regard, as it would seem, for the charms of female society. Vogl went to his friend Koller's where musical Pepi entertained him, but Schubert must have suffered from an embarras de richesses of young-ladydom. He lodged in the house No. 117 on the Platz, where lived Dr. Albert Schellmann and his five daughters, and the treasurer of the district with three daughters. In all, eight charming creatures surrounded the Viennese musician, making of him such an idol as only women can when they have found their hero. Under these circumstances, Schubert bore himself well. He enjoyed the situation and wrote home to brother Ferdinand in a spirit far from difficult to distinguish as that of much complacency. Here is his letter, dated July 15, 1819:—

"Dear Brother,—I hope this letter will find you in Vienna and that you are well. I write to you particularly to send me the 'Stabat Mater,' which we want to perform. I am uncommonly well just now, and intend to remain so if only the weather will keep fine. Yesterday we had a tremendous storm here about noon. The lightning killed a woman and maimed two men. In the house where I am lodging there are eight young ladies, and nearly all pretty. You see one has plenty to do. Vogl and I dine every day with Herr von Koller; his daughter is uncommonly pretty, plays the piano capitably, and sings several of my songs.

"Please forward the enclosed letter. You see I am not so absolutely faithless as you perhaps think. "Remember me to my parents, brothers and sisters, your wife, and all friends. Don't forget the 'Stabat Mater.' Your ever faithful brother, Franz."

Plenty of music was made in Steyr while Schubert and Vogl remained there. The friends often met at Paumgartner's or Koller's, and it is said that on one of these occasions the "Erl-King" was performed in parts, Vogl singing the father's music, Schubert the Erl-King's, and Pepi the boy's. Sir George Grove suggests that the composer may have given his favourite version of the same work on a comb. Very likely he did, and that much harmless fun prevailed at these simple gatherings. About the middle of August our tourists tore themselves away from the hours and hospitalities of Steyr in order to visit Linz and Salzburg. Whether they actually extended their journey to Mozart's birth-place does not appear, but a letter from Schubert to Mayrhofer proves that they got as far as Linz:—

"My dear Mayrhofer,—If the world thrives as well with you as it does with me, you are well and hearty. I am just at present in Linz. I have been with the Spau'n's, and met Kenner, Kreil, and Forst-mayer. There, too, I made acquaintance with Spau'n's mother, and Ottenwald, whose "Cradle Song" I set and sang to him. I found plenty of amusement in Steyr. The surrounding country is heavenly, and Linz too is beautiful. We, that is Vogl and I, shall go very soon to Salzburg. How I long for! I recommend to your notice the bearer of this letter, a student of Kremsmünster, Kahl by name; he is journeying by way of Vienna to Idria, on a visit to his parents. Please let him have my bed during the time he stays with you. I am very anxious that you should treat him as kindly as possible, for he is a dear good fellow. Please greet Frau von S. heartily for me. Have you written anything? I hope so. We kept Vogl's birthday with a Cantata, the words by Stadler, the music by me;* people were thoroughly pleased. Now, then, farewell until the middle of September. Your friend, Franz Schubert."

The travellers were back in Steyr shortly afterwards, and, at the time named by Schubert in his letter, started on the return journey to Vienna.

We have seen that the weeks spent in holiday-making were not entirely weeks of rest from composing. Schubert could not keep his pen off paper under any circumstances. Ideas were always coming to him, and their demand for expression was ever conceded. During the tour he wrote the celebrated Quintet which has its slow movement founded upon the melody of "Die Forelle," doing this, we are told, at the special instance of Paumgartner, who promptly added the manuscript parts to his store of musical treasures. We read, also, of a vocal quintet, two vocal quartets, a "Salve Regina," and three hymns as among the creations of the same period. These, we may suppose, were thrown off for use at the Steyr music-making parties, and, by the composer, thought of no more. They still remain unpublished. Schubert's last effort in the Styrian town was purely of a literary character. On the day (September 14) of his departure, he wrote in Fräulein Stadler's album: "Enjoy the present so wisely that the past may be pleasant to recollect, and the future not alarming to contemplate"—one of the pompous aphorisms which our fathers regarded as wisdom in its highest form of expression. Sir George Grove quotes another to match, by Mozart, extracted from the album of an English freemason: "Patience and tranquillity of mind contribute more to cure our distempers as (sic) the whole art of medicine." Such was the fashion of the time, and it does not seem to have mattered much that the philosophy and its expounder were often very far apart.

If Schubert returned with a heavy heart to his un-rewarded life in Vienna, he soon found that the clouds of life were lightening to him. It must be remembered that up to this time, and apart from the early performances of his church music, his name had found its way only once into a Viennese programme. That was on February 28, 1819, when the tenor, Jager, sang the "Schäfer's Klagelied," and obtained for it great applause. Imagine the feelings of this neglected genius as he heard that his operatic farce "Die Zwillinge," composed, or, at any rate, begun, in 1818, was actually to be produced at the Kärnthner-Theater. The important event took place June 14, 1820, and was Schubert's first serious appeal to the public of his native city. We need not give the "argument" of a stupid story. Enough that the music consists of ten numbers, with an overture, all of which, having been published by Peters, may be examined by amateurs for themselves at very little expense. It is certainly not in the master's best vein, for the task did not interest him a bit; nevertheless, we quite agree with Sir George Grove that it is "light, fresh, and melodious, pointed, unusually compact and interesting throughout." The farce had no success, running for six nights only; but its production served to bring Schubert's name forward, and not unfavourably, although the Viennese critics charged his music with lacking tune. A rival house, the Theater an der Wien, now sought the young master's services, and entrusted to him the libretto of a melo-drama, entitled "Die Zauberharfe," music to which was written, it is said, in the short space of two weeks. The new piece received the following advertisement in the journals of August 19, 1820:—

* It is to be hoped that this work, copies of which are extant, will appear in Breitkopf and Härtel's critical edition.

"By the liberality of his Excellency Count Ferdinand von Palffy, proprietor of the Imperial Theatre, an der Wien, three artists, whose connections and engagements do not sanction their claims to any clear receipts, are now allowed such payments, which the Count has, unasked, conceded. These artists are Herr Neefe, scene painter; Roller, master of the machinery; and Lucca Piazza, costumer of the said theatre, who, from their important services to the public, are well deserving of so high a mark of consideration. This benefit performance will take place next Monday, August 21, on the occasion of the third representation of the new magic operetta, in three acts, 'Die Zauberharfe'; music by Herr Schubert; decorations, scenery, and costumes by the receivers of the benefit."

The new play had a short life, and not a merry one. Its libretto—an unusually stupid thing—was killed by ridicule out of hand, while the music, chiefly choral and melodrama, underwent severe criticism. According to Kreissle, the Vienna press declared that it "hindered rather than helped the action of the piece, and betrayed absolute ignorance of the rules of melo-drama. The way of treating the music for the magic harps showed a poor faded and decayed taste, and was wanting in the necessary power and characteristics which ought always to accompany ethereal spirits." On its part the Allgemeine Musikalische Zeitung said:—"The composer gives glimpses here and there of talent. There is, on the whole, a want of technical arrangement, which can only be gained by experience; the numbers, generally speaking, are too long and wearisome; the harmony progressions too harsh, the instrumentation overloaded; the choruses vapid and weak. The most successful numbers are the introductory Adagio of the overture, and the Romance for the tenor; the expression in these is lovely; the simplicity is noble, and the modulation delicate. An idyllic subject would be admirably adapted to the composer." None of the music thus criticised has yet been published, but all of it is available. "It deserves to be unearthed," remarks Kreissle, "for there is no doubt in it much that is beautiful, and Schubert himself reckoned it as one of his most successful works."

All this time our indefatigable young master had in his mind, and under his fingers, quite another class of work. In February, 1820, he resolved to compose an Easter Cantata, and chose as text a poem by the theologian, Niemeyer, entitled "Lazarus; or, the Feast of the Resurrection." Kreissle says:—"The birth of this Oratorio is a mystery, and will probably remain so for ever, for not even Schubert's most trusted friends, such, for instance, as Franz von Schober, who, in the year 1820, was thrown frequently into personal intimacy with the composer, can give any explanation of the cause, or other external circumstances, under which the work in question was written; but it is certain that to many of Schubert's associates the very existence of this work remained hidden." Its existence seems to have been quickly forgotten by those who did know. Indeed, there is even now a doubt whether Schubert completed the Oratorio, inasmuch as the third part has never been found. The first part was discovered by Kreissle (1859) in Spaun's collection of the master's MSS.; the second part came somehow, but, unhappily, incomplete, into the hands of Mr. Thayer (1861); for the rest, search has hitherto been vain. As usual, the composer was hampered by his text, with its abounding dialogue. As to this, Kreissle writes:—"The compiler of the text has by no means lightened the work of the composer. A genius, such as Schubert's, was necessary to steer successfully past the dangerous rocks and quicksands of monotony, incidental to a subject wearisome from an almost unbroken sameness of treatment, and so overweighed with recitative passages. Schubert applied himself to his task, not in a descriptive, but dramatic vein, as the poem required; and with what delicacy of feeling and admirable skill he availed himself of the opportunity offered by the poet for the development of his dramatic power, the music allotted to the Daughter of Jairus and Simon, the Sadducee, bears the most brilliant testimony. An intellectual piecemeal criticism of a delicate refined work, which rushed spontaneously from the composer's brain with an uninterrupted current, would be like analysing moonlight, and would be of little advantage, although such minute criticism might bring to the surface many a hidden and buried beauty." We may add that the fragments of "Lazarus" were performed at Vienna in 1863.

In addition to the foregoing, an Opera, "Sakuntala," engaged Schubert's attention during this prolific year; but he never finished it, the book being hopelessly bad. Other works referable to the same period are the 23rd Psalm—made so familiar in London by Henry Leslie's Choir—a (second) setting of Goethe's "Gesang der Geister über den Wassern"—once performed in this country under Mr. Prout's direction—the Allegro for strings in C minor, the Fantasia in C for pianoforte solo, and seventeen songs.

The next year (1821) opened in sunshine for Schubert, then becoming known to the slowly perceptive people of Vienna. A change for the better was certainly not unnecessary, although, if the master's biographers may be credited, Schubert had only himself to thank for much that was sordid and distressful in his circumstances. Anxious to make out the best case for his hero, Kreissle puts the whole matter into very diplomatic language, but, between the lines, it is easy to see how far the master stood in his own light. He was emphatically a Bohemian, impatient of any kind of social restraint, and unhappy out of the free-and-easy company of men like himself. "At no time of life," says Kreissle, "was he wanting in sympathising friends, who recognised his genius, and were always ready to assist him in word and deed. That he did not invariably feel drawn towards these persons, but, following his own inclination, attached himself socially to those who, doubtless, delighted in his songs, but valued him rather as a boon companion than a creative genius, and who, themselves at war with existence, were not in the position to give him a strong arm of support—all this cannot be thrown into the teeth of either class as reprehensible conduct." Under Kreissle's cautious language lies the whole case; and it is a sufficiently common one. How many do we all know who are truthfully described as their own worst enemy? We should remember the facts just stated when Vienna is broadly accused of letting her gifted son live in poverty and die almost a pauper. That the city behaved unlike a generous mother may be true enough, but there are children whose lives say seriously what the Irishman uttered as a blunder: "I will be drowned and nobody shall help me."

We spoke just now of New Year's sunshine. It came to Schubert in the form of three testimonials from distinguished personages—testimonials which a prudent man would have used as keys to unlock the gates opening upon social prosperity. The first bore the name of Count von Dietrichstein, Beethoven's "Hofmusikgraf," and was sent to Vogl, with the following note:—

"I beg of you, my dear friend, to be good enough to hand this over to the excellent Schubert. I trust it may be of some advantage to him, for since I have fathomed the genius of this young powerful artist—one of such rare promise—it has been one of my most ardent wishes, as far as I could, to bring him sub umbrâ alarum tuarum. Good morning, my dear friend, rara avis in terra—I ought to say ravissima."

The Count's testimonial ran thus:—

"My inclinations and my duty inducing me to examine men of distinguished musical talents, especially those found in my own country, and to encourage, to the best of my powers, their noble efforts, I have particular pleasure in certifying that Herr Franz Schubert, who received the first rudiments of education in the Convict while he served as a chorister boy in the Royal Chapel, has, in the course of a few years, by native genius, earnest study of composition, and constant preparatory labour, already given the most eloquent proofs of his deep knowledge, feeling, and good taste, and that it only remains for me to wish that an opportunity be offered to this estimable man to unfold the fairest blooms in the thriving fields of universal art, and more particularly that of dramatic music."

The second testimonial came from the acting Court Secretary, Von Mosel:—

"I certify that Herr Franz Schubert, late pupil of Hofcapellmeister Anton Salieri, as well from his deep knowledge in the theory and practice of harmony as of the auxiliary sciences requisite for vocal composition and distinguished talents, is one of the most promising of our young composers, of whom the Court Theatre and Opera House may expect the most delightful artistic productions."

The third testimonial was signed by Wieg, director of the Opera, Salieri, and von Eichtall:—

"We, the undersigned, testify that Herr Franz Schubert, on account of his famous and most promising musical talent, which he has proved chiefly in the art of composition, has been employed by the Committee of Management of the Court Theatre, and served with great distinction, to the satisfaction of every one."

Sir George Grove describes the receipt of these documents as marking "the first good epoch in Schubert's struggling life," and continues: "He had now been writing for more than seven years, with an industry and disregard of consequences which are really fearful to contemplate, and yet, as far as fame or profit were concerned, might almost as well have remained absolutely idle. Here at length was a break in the cloud." But it does not appear that the testimonials did Schubert any good. "I don't know," says Kreissle, "if he ever made use of them." Fate had decreed that the composer should remain as he was to the end of the short, but wonderful, chapter of his life."

NATURALLY enough so conspicuous a performance of "Mors et Vita" as that attended by her Majesty invited a renewed expression of opinion upon the merits of the work. The opportunity, we are bound to say, was not neglected by those, above all, who see in M. Gounod's music much to condemn. It is far from our purpose to enter, in these columns, upon a discussion of the question thus raised, though we may at least ask the objectors to be consistent with themselves. But that is their own business. We shall go more to the point by showing, as we can do, that the public—the real tribunal—do not agree with a section of the critics. Amateurs everywhere have behaved kindly to the French master's second Trilogy, which is going fast round the world in a sort of triumph. Taking England, we find that "Mors et Vita" has been seven times performed in the Metropolis—that is to say, at the Albert Hall (three times), by the Sacred Harmonic Society, at Novello's Concerts, at the Bow and Bromley Institute, and at the Crystal Palace. Among our provincial towns, Brighton, Nottingham, Newcastle, Birmingham, Manchester, and Stirling have heard it, not to mention places of less note. Across the Atlantic, the Trilogy has been performed in Brooklyn, Boston, Philadelphia, St. Louis, Toronto, and other towns; while on the Continent, Brussels has made its acquaintance, and Antwerp has twice applauded it. At the present moment two performances are being organised in Paris, and these two would have been six but for the necessity of refusing other applications in order that the Trocadero might have preference. Lastly, "Mors et Vita" figures in the programme of the forthcoming Gloucester Festival. This does not read like the first six months' history of an unsuccessful work, and it is clear that the public at home and abroad see something to admire in M. Gounod's latest production. Every objection raised by its censors may be true—let us assume that it is, and regret that the vast majority of music-lovers are incapable of discerning gross faults. But in such a case, what have we to go by? Or must we conclude that in our art the vox populi, so far from being the vox Dei, is simply an utterance of ignorance and error?

THE appearance of Mr. Sims Reeves at the recent Concert of Mr. de Jong, at Manchester, although three of the artists announced to sing—Madame Valleria, Miss Clara Samuelli, and Signor Poli—were, in consequence of the exceptional severity of the weather, placed hors de combat, is a convincing proof, not only that he takes every care to battle against climatic influences, but that he never disappoints the public save when he feels that he is incapacitated from doing himself every justice. Another cause of congratulation is that this excellent artist—who, whenever he sings, reads a lesson of inestimable value to all aspiring vocalists—is in full possession of all his powers, a fact unmistakably shown at the above-mentioned Concert by his exquisite interpretation of Handel's "Deeper and deeper still," Berthold Tours's

"Stars of the summer night," and "Tom Bowling." The success of the Concerts given by him at the Albert Palace has, we understand, been so decisive as to lead to a second series; and during the past month he has also sung in a Ballad Concert at the Royal Victoria Hall and at the Sacred Concert, on Ash Wednesday, at St. James's Hall, on every occasion displaying that perfection of voice and style which has placed him in a position it is the earnest wish of every lover of the art that he should for many years continue to occupy.

THOSE who recollect Madame Alboni in the zenith of her career before the public will be gratified to hear that she celebrated her sixtieth birthday on the 6th ult., at her residence in the Cours la Reine, Paris, where she is living in retirement with her husband, M. Zieger. The musical party assembled on the occasion included the soprano, Madame Marie Battu, Mdle. Marimon, and other distinguished artists. The magnificent voice of the hostess—which, we are told, is "unimpaired"—was heard in the "Pro Peccatis," from Rossini's "Stabat Mater," the buffo Trio from "Il Matrimonio Segreto," and the Quartet from "Rigoletto," a recitation being given by the popular French actor Dumaine, written in honour of the anniversary by Jacques Normand, with a pianoforte accompaniment, all the singers uniting in the chorus "Alboni, Alboni." It is said that the artist who was the subject of this graceful tribute was deeply affected by the performance, which proved indeed to be the great event of the evening. The pleasure of recording this interesting artistic gathering is strengthened by its permanently setting at rest the question of the great vocalist's age, respecting which biographers seem to have "agreed to differ."

IN the strange and pitiable scene which brought the recent brief season of Italian Opera, at Her Majesty's Theatre, to so disastrous an end, sundry critics have detected fresh and conclusive evidence of the altered taste of the London audience. But unless we are greatly mistaken the lesson to be learnt in this case is financial, not æsthetic. There can be no doubt that the spread of a critical spirit has brought with it a distaste for much operatic music, on the score of its triviality, which met with our fathers' unreserved admiration. The increased enchevêtrement of life, to borrow the phrase of M. Daudet, has doubtless resulted in a demand for greater complexity in music. Again, a great number of opera-goers have been familiarised, through the exertions of Mr. Carl Rosa, with libretti in the vernacular, and find it harder to revert to operas performed in a foreign tongue. Still, in spite of these facts, and in the face of the numerous competing musical attractions which have grown up since the days when the opera was the great musical event of the year, there are ample grounds for believing that an Italian Opera company which aimed at a uniform level of excellence, rather than especial brilliancy in a few individual cases, would meet with the public support naturally denied to ventures which rest on unsound financial foundations, and have neither the attractions of the star or ensemble system to commend them.

WE cannot regard the dearth of musical articles worthy of the name in our leading magazines and reviews otherwise than as a regrettable omission. If music ever emerges at all into the higher spheres of periodical literature, it is only in the garb of anecdote, or in virtue of its educational value, or in rare cases as the subject for abstruse philosophical inquiry. The greater space available in such a review as the Nineteenth Century, and the cultivated character of the audience to which it appeals, constitute advantages for the asserting of the claims of music which are not to be found in the more limited fields offered by the musical journals proper, the daily papers, or those in which not the least of the arts is obliged to keep company with football, billiards, and the chronique scandaleuse. This is certainly one of the things which they manage better abroad. Hardly a number of the Revue des Deux Mondes appears without a musical article. Especial attention may be called to the issue of March 1, which contains, in the concluding portion of the paper, entitled "A century of French music," some remarkably bright and piquant pages about "Carmen." The treatment of Mérimée's novel by the librettists, Bizet's fondness for Spain, his use of local colouring, and, in particular, of the Arabian asbein mode—the four descending notes of the minor scale, beginning at the top—or "mode of the devil," as the "Carmen" motive; all these points, and many more, are treated with great piquancy and felicity of expression.

It is with great satisfaction that we have observed the forcible plea in favour of the further extension of non-congregational Sunday music advanced by Sir George Grove in the Times of the 22nd ult. We cannot forbear from quoting the concluding portion of a letter written so thoroughly in the spirit of the late Dean Stanley: "Many a church which has now only a scanty congregation on the Lord's Day would be filled to overflowing if such music as 'The Messiah,' Mendelssohn's 'Hymn of Praise,' or 'Praise Jehovah,' or 'Christus,' with a Symphony of Beethoven (as truly religious as any oratorio) could be heard there, thoroughly well performed, on a Sunday afternoon, with a few prayers to sanction the performance and assert its religious character. Nor would it be less satisfactory because it had taken place in so appropriate a spot as a church, which to nine-tenths of us is the home of some of our best associations." It is welcome to hear so weighty a voice upholding the proposition that all good music is sacred.

QUEEN VICTORIA.

FEBRUARY 26, 1886.

A QUARTER of a century to mourn
Thy wedded love, true woman-hearted Queen!
And now, as loyal as thou long hast been
To grief, thou loyal art to joy's soft morn,
That dawns upon thy heart, and doth adorn
Thyself and those around thee; with its sheen
Illuming thousands where thou'rt welcome seen
In smiles, a wide-spread kindly sunshine born.
Ay, "Mors et Vita" is the fitting strain
To touch thy widowed heart and teach it peace;
Life after Death doth cause its sting to cease,
Restoring it to gladness once again:
Well pleased, thy love beholds renewed thy cheer;
In sympathy of soul he hovers near.

MARY COWDEN-CLARKE.

Villa Novello, Genoa, March 3, 1886.

ROYAL ALBERT HALL.

It would not be in place here to discuss the Queen's visit to the Albert Hall from the courtier point of view, nor to describe the ceremony in the style adopted by ordinary newspaper correspondents. But in a purely musical sense the event was one of no ordinary importance, and it may seem strange if we say that those who regard the interests of art as paramount, cannot reflect upon it with feelings of unqualified satisfaction. No reasonable person could complain at the choice of "Mors et Vita" for the ceremony of February 26. Nothing more suitable than the latest work of one of the most distinguished composers of the day could have been selected for the reappearance of Her Majesty at an oratorio performance. But if music is once more to bask in the favour of the English Court it will be necessary to scrutinise narrowly what is done, with a view to checking the evil effects which must necessarily ensue if the method adopted on this occasion is to be made a precedent. A bad example is contagious, especially if it comes stamped with the authority of those in high places. If a masterwork is maltreated at a royal performance, why should conductors as a body hesitate to present compositions in whatever maimed condition they please? We are not arguing against the justification for cuts in the abstract. "Mors et Vita" is a lengthy work, and some numbers might possibly be omitted without damage to the composer's main ideas. But to pay no regard whatever to those ideas—to destroy the consistency and ethical meaning of a work—is reprehensible under any circumstances. If any read this who are not yet acquainted with the sacred Trilogy, let them imagine a performance of "Elijah" with everything left out between the air "Is not his word like a fire," and the chorus "Thanks be to God," and they will gain a notion of the treatment accorded to Gounod's Oratorio. Four numbers of the Requiem were omitted, but the first part was rendered as long as before by immediately following the "Agnus Dei" by the "Judez" and the "Judicium Electorum," the rest of the second part being struck out. Naturally the impressiveness of the two last-named movements was entirely lost, and the audience must have come away with a far less favourable opinion of the work than would have been the case had it received more reverent treatment. Let us hasten to admit that the portions actually given received the fullest possible justice. Mr. Barnby's magnificent choir has never sung better, and we need not say how Madame Albani, Madame Patey, Mr. Lloyd, and Mr. Santley acquitted themselves in the solo music. The hall was thronged in every part, and when the vast audience rose on the entrance of Her Majesty the spectacle was singularly imposing. It is said that another visit may be paid by the Queen during the spring. Let us hope that if so it may be found possible on that occasion to unite obedience to royal wishes with respect to musical art. The two things are surely not absolutely incompatible.

When the theatres were closed on Ash Wednesday it was said that the public went to hear "The Messiah" because nothing else was open to them. That the assertion was incorrect, was proved on the 10th ult., when the Lord Chamberlain's interdict was no longer in force, for the audience in the Albert Hall was even larger than usual. The inclemency of the weather, however, had affected the singers originally engaged, and two changes were made, Miss Anna Williams appearing in place of Madame Valleria and Mr. Ben Davies instead of Mr. Winch. The young English tenor secured the favour of his hearers, rendering all his share of the music satisfactorily except the air "Thou shalt break them" where, following bad example, he attempted a high A at the close with unfortunate results. Again the bass, Mr. W. H. Burgen, who was generally efficient, forced the pace so in "Why do the nations" as to entirely destroy the dignity of the air. There is no need to say how Miss Williams and Madame Patey acquitted themselves, or how the choruses were rendered by Mr. Barnby's well drilled choir.

NOVELLO'S ORATORIO CONCERTS.

At the Fifth Concert, on the 2nd ult., the programme commenced with Dvorák's "Stabat Mater," and was originally intended to include Goetz's "Water Lily," and Wagner's "Holy Supper of the Apostles," but Mr. Mackenzie's artistic respect for these works prompted him at the last moment to defer them until adequate preparation could be afforded for their presentation before an audience accustomed to that perfection of rendering which has become the rule at these performances; and a second part was therefore substituted, comprising Gluck's Overture to "Iphigenie en Aulide" (with Wagner's ending) and Mr. Mackenzie's Scotch Rhapsody, "Burns," as orchestral pieces; Handel's "Sweet Bird," sung by Madame Albani, and the "Preislied," from "Die Meistersinger," for Mr. E. Lloyd. Were we to add anything to what we have already written respecting Dvorák's masterly setting of the "Stabat Mater," it could merely be that our pleasure is enhanced at each repetition of the work. Not only the inventive power, but the original treatment of the themes, the excessive beauty of the orchestration, and the true sympathy of the music with the text, reveal a genius the promise of which has, since our first acquaintance with the composition, been amply fulfilled; and we have now only to express a hope that the composer may add very many to the treasures of an art which he has already done so much to enrich. The performance of the work was such as to reflect the utmost credit upon Mr. Mackenzie and the members of a choir now thoroughly established in public favour. Of the vocalists—Madame Albani, Madame Patey, Mr. E. Lloyd, and Mr. Santley—little need be said, yet we cannot but pause to record the fine singing of Madame Patey in the "Inflamatus," and of Mr. Lloyd in "Fac me vere." Both the orchestral works were finely played, and Madame Albani's singing of Handel's show-song (with Mr. Svendsen's flute obligato) and Mr. Lloyd's unapproachable rendering of Wagner's "Preislied" were thoroughly appreciated. Mr. Mackenzie conducted with his usual care and judgment, and was heartily applauded. The next Concert will take place on the 6th inst., when Liszt's Oratorio "St. Elizabeth," will be given, in the presence of the composer.

CRYSTAL PALACE.

THE most enjoyable features of the thirteenth Concert were undoubtedly Schumann's Second Symphony in C and Mendelssohn's "Hebrides" Overture, in each of which the orchestra proved that they had distinctly improved upon the high level of excellence attained at the earlier Concerts of the season.

In Chopin's F minor Concerto (No. 2) M. de Pachmann displayed his now familiar virtuosity of touch, and, let us add, of gesticulation, until near the close of the work, when a lapse of memory occasioned one of those uncomfortable incidents in which sympathy for the performer is mingled with annoyance at the cause of his misfortune—namely, the compliance with the prevailing fashion of dispensing with notes, a law more honoured in the breach than in the observance. The readiness of resource of Mr. Manns and M. de Pachmann soon extricated them from their difficulty, and the latter gentleman has since shown a commendable readiness to profit by this experience. His share in the programme also included a Nocturne by J. F. Barnett, of a mild Chopinesque character, and Raff's familiar "La Fileuse," for which, in answer to an encore, he substituted Mendelssohn's Rondo Capriccioso, a piece which serves to show his peculiar qualities at their very best. As an orchestral novelty, Berlioz's Ballet Airs from his Opera "Les Troyens" were given for the first time, but from their position at the very end of a somewhat long programme, from the absence of any analytical comment, and from their inherent coldness, failed to create a favourable impression. They abound in curious effects and combinations, but appeal to the head rather than stir the blood, as such quasi-Oriental dance music should do. The vocalist was Miss Bertha Moore, whose fresh and sweet soprano voice and unaffected style extorted recognition, in despite of a most ill-judged selection. Sandwiched between Chopin and Schumann, the tawdry Scena from "Lurline," "Sad as my soul," was redolent of the music-hall, so violent was the contrast. Taubert's well-worn "My darling was so fair," and better still, Sterndale Bennett's graceful "May Dew," tended happily to obliterate the memory of this indiscretion, and served to show what a charming effect Miss Moore could produce by the use of her highest register in pianissimo.

With his orchestra considerably reinforced, and a competent quartet of soloists in Misses Amy Sherwin and Annie Layton and Messrs. Harper Kearnott and Watkin Mills, Mr. Manns addressed himself to the performance of the Choral Symphony on the 6th ult., and with a very admirable result. The most notable divergence from Herr Richter's familiar rendering was in the Trio, where the slower tempo must be pronounced a distinct improvement, apart from its indisputable correspondence with the author's intention. On the other hand, the recitative passages for the double-basses, immediately after the Adagio, seemed slightly wanting in the emphasis which their expository tone requires. The choir, and in particular the sopranos, struggled bravely with the notorious difficulties which beset their path, but a certain coarseness of tone detracted from the merit of their efforts. The orchestral portion of the Concert also included fine renderings of the "Freischütz" Overture and the "Vorspiel" to "Parsifal," Wagner being also represented by "Rienzi's Prayer," of which Mr. Harper Kearnott gave a vocally correct, but dramatically colourless, reading. This gentleman's enunciation leaves a good deal to be desired on the score of distinctness. We were able, however, to make out that he was not singing the English version set down in the programme, a remark which also applies in the case of "Connais-tu le pays" ("Mignon"), given by Miss Sherwin, who, though effective in the quartet, was heard to less advantage than usual in Thomas's graceful romance.

Considerable interest was aroused by the announcement of Mr. Mackenzie's Violin Concerto as the chief novelty of the fifteenth Concert, the part for solo instrument being taken by Mr. Richard Gompertz. This gentleman, well known as an excellent teacher and player both in Cambridge and London, combines an agreeable tone and refined style with a considerable degree of technical dexterity, qualities which he displayed to advantage in his rendering of this interesting and brilliant work, which is surely destined to become a valuable addition to the comparatively limited répertoire of such compositions. The deepest impression was certainly made by the second and third movements, though the further acquaintance which we hope shortly to make with the work may tend to modify this opinion. A want of breadth and fulness in the tone of the soloist, and an occasional roughness on the part of the orchestra, prevented this from being a really representative performance, and doubtless accounted for the comparatively cold reception the work met with. Mr. Gompertz was again heard in a characteristic "Habanera," by Sarasate, in which he showed such agility and precision as to win a recall. The Symphony performed on this occasion was that by Haydn in D (No. 2 of the Salomon set), the grace and freshness of which entirely failed to waken the enthusiasm of a sparse and undemonstrative audience. The vocalists were Mr. and Mrs. Henschel, who were associated in a duet from Goetz's "Taming of the Shrew," besides each contributing a solo. Mr. Henschel's voice has not improved in quality of late years, but his singing is always that of a thorough musician, and "Pogner's address" was as interesting vocally in his hands as that number could be expected to prove. Mrs. Henschel gave a finished rendering of her husband's clever setting of Victor Hugo's beautiful "Adieu de l'hôte de l'Arabe," to which, nevertheless, on the score of coherence and passion, we are inclined to prefer Bizet's version. Mrs. Henschel's voice, though of limited volume, is of very pure quality, sweet, and tuneful, and her singing is characterised by expression and refinement. But in her case we are bound, at the risk of seeming monotonous, to repeat our often-made charge of indistinctness of enunciation. Hardly a single word was audible in the gallery. A selection from Rubinstein's second Suite, "Bal costumé," noisily orchestrated, but not otherwise remarkable, brought the programme to a close at an unusually early hour.

That M. Gounod's "Mors et Vita" has lost none of its ability to attract crowded audiences, was amply proved on the 20th ult., when this work was performed before an assemblage which filled every part of the house, and testified its appreciation by prolonged applause at the close of the Concert. For this happy result Mr. Manns must be accounted primarily responsible, having shown on this occasion even more than usual vigour and sympathy. The improvement noticeable this year in the Crystal Palace choir was decidedly maintained. The peculiar return to the tonic harmony in the first number of the "Requiem" proved fatal to the tenors, and the massive double chorus "A custodia matutina" was given tamely, though without any fall in pitch. With these exceptions, however, the choir proved thoroughly efficient. Messrs. Lloyd and Santley repeated their well-known performances, while the contralto music was safe in the hands of Miss Hope Glenn. The burden of the solo music was entrusted on this occasion to Miss Annie Marriott, a conscientious and meritorious singer. Except for an exaggerated use of the portamento, little fault could be found with her conception of the part; but the sense that an artist is singing throughout at high pressure detracts from the auditor's enjoyment. This was especially observable in that most trying passage "Sed signifer Michael," the transference of which to the tenor is justified not merely by the strain which it imposes upon any soprano voice, but by the original indication of the composer, who had marked it for "soprano or tenor." Of the performance of the orchestra, specially reinforced to meet the demands of the score, we can speak with unqualified praise; the appalling clangour of the "Tuba ad ultimum iudicium" and the suave melody of the "Judeu" in particular exhibiting the capacity of Mr. Manns's forces to deal with the opposite poles of musical expression.

MONDAY AND SATURDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

THE tide of novelty which flowed so strongly during the early part of this season has now ebbed, and in the past month the programmes have consisted mainly of familiar works. On the other hand, the welcome return of Herr Joachim and Signor Piatti has stimulated public interest, and the Monday audiences have considerably increased. Our notice must commence with the Concert of Saturday, February 27, which, however, may be briefly dismissed. Mendelssohn's Quartet in E flat (Op. 12) is a great favourite, thanks chiefly to its quaint and engaging canzonetta, which, as usual, was asked for a second time. Of Brahms's Piano Quartet in G minor (Op. 25) and Handel's Violin Sonata in D, nothing need be said. The latter work was played, as on so many previous occasions, by Madame Néruda, who might with advantage enlarge her repertory from the same source. Handel published twelve Violin Sonatas, but only two of them have been heard at these Concerts. Mr. Max Pauer, the pianist on this occasion, modestly selected two trifles by Schumann, the Study for pedal piano, No. 4, and the March (Op. 76, No. 4), his rendering of which appeared to give perfect satisfaction to the audience. Mr. Santley sang Gounod's expressive ballad "The Arrow and the Song," and Handel's "Revenge, Timotheus cries."

Monday, the 1st ult., was one of the most terrible days of the winter, and there was no cause for wonder that Herr Joachim received his greeting from a smaller assemblage than usual. The old enthusiasm however prevailed, and the great violinist had no reason to fear any weakening of his hold on the public. As was fitting, the first item was a Beethoven Quartet—namely, the No. 2 in E minor of the Rasowmowski set. The rendering by Messrs. Joachim, Ries, Hollander, and Howell was as near perfection as possible. With all respect to one of the truest artists of the day, we do not think he was altogether wise in his choice of solos. The Adagio from Spohr's Concerto in G, No. 11, with piano accompaniment, may pass, but is the repertory of genuine violin music so small that there is any necessity to transcribe Schumann's pianoforte works? Herr Ernst Rudorff's arrangements of the Gartenfest and Am Springbrunnen from Op. 85 are skilful, but they are superfluous, and not in place at the Popular Concerts. Miss Fanny Davies gave a charming rendering of Mendelssohn's Scherzo à Capriccio in F sharp minor, and Mr. Ben Davies showed how greatly he is improving as a vocalist, in songs by Sterndale Bennett and Randegger. The Concert ended with Haydn's Quartet in B flat (Op. 64, No. 5). Very few lines will suffice as regards the Concert of the following Saturday. Nothing need be said concerning such familiar works as Mendelssohn's Quartet in E minor (Op. 44, No. 2) and Schubert's Trio in B flat (Op. 99). Miss Agnes Zimmermann gave a highly finished rendering of three Studies by Henselt, and set a good example by repeating the third in response to an encore. Herr Joachim selected Schumann's Fantasia in A minor (Op. 131), which had only been heard once before. It was composed expressly for Herr Joachim in 1853, little more than two years before Schumann's death. It was therefore one of his last efforts, and though full of vigour, with here and there a touch of brightness, it speaks only too plainly of the mental exhaustion from which the master was suffering. The vocalist at this Concert was Mr. Hirwen Jones, a young tenor of promise. His voice however is not yet fully under control, and he was not altogether fortunate in his choice of songs.

The following Monday was a red letter day in the calendar of the undertaking. The public had almost ceased to hope for the return of Signor Piatti this season, and the announcement of his reappearance was therefore doubly welcome. Need it be said that he was greeted with vociferous cheering and applause, again and again renewed. The demonstration was at once a testimony to his artistic worth and a tribute of sympathy and congratulation. It would have been painful had Signor Piatti's career been cut short by his unfortunate accident, and his complete restoration to health and resumption of his old position removes all cause for anxiety on that score, more especially as no trace of ill effects was observable in his playing either in Mozart's Quintet in G minor or Veracini's Largo and Allegro, in F, for violoncello. In execution, phrasing, and expression, Signor Piatti is still without a rival on his instrument. The pianist at this Concert was Miss Zimmermann, who gave a distinctive reading of Schumann's "Faschingsschwank aus Wien," a work that seems becoming very popular. Schubert's characteristic and effective Rondeau Brillant (Op. 70) for piano and violin came last in the programme. Miss Hope Glenn was deservedly applauded for her rendering of songs by Gluck, Tschaiowsky, and Schumann. A programme of well tried works was presented on Saturday, the 13th ult., including Mozart's Quartet in G, No. 1, Beethoven's Serenade Trio, and Tarini's Sonata "Il Trillo del Diavolo," which Herr Joachim never fails to give us soon after his arrival. In speaking of Beethoven's work the annotator says, oddly enough, that the other Serenade in D (Op. 25) is for flute, violins, and violas. The singular number should have been used in both instances. Miss Fanny Davies was heard to the utmost advantage in Chopin's Impromptu in F sharp, and Mr. Harper Kearton gave a commendable rendering of Mr. Mackenzie's charming song "The earth below and the Heaven above."

In the palmy days of Italian Opera, managers were wont from time to time to announce a performance with a "combination cast"—that is, a galaxy of stars of the first magnitude. Mr. Chappell tried something of the same kind on Monday, the 15th ult., and did not reckon without his public. Madame Néruda was to lead Bach's double Concerto in D minor, with Herr Joachim as second fiddle; and the two great artists were to reverse their positions in Mendelssohn's Quintet in B flat (Op. 87). Need it be said that St. James's Hall proved too small for the number of persons who desired to "assist" on so memorable an occasion, programmes as well as seats being all disposed of before the commencement of the Concert. Spitta's glowing eulogy of the Bach Concerto was quoted in the book, and it is probable that had the eminent biographer been present, he would have used as eloquent words respecting the performance. It was, indeed, a marvellous executive display, the unity of style and tone being as remarkable as the mere technical perfection showed by each player. As a matter of course, the enthusiasm of the listeners relieved itself in prolonged applause, and, in order to satisfy them, the artists returned and repeated the slow movement. On any other occasion the exceedingly fine performance of Beethoven's Sonata in A (Op. 69), for piano and violoncello, by Miss Zimmermann and Signor Piatti, and that of Grieg's charming, though unpretentious, Sonata in E minor, by Miss Zimmermann would have attracted more than ordinary attention. Miss Hope Glenn, in airs by Handel and Arne, fairly held her own against the more powerful attractions of the evening.

The Concerts of the 20th and 22nd, the last we can notice this month, need little more than formal record. On the former occasion, Cherubini's Quartet in E flat, the most popular of the published series of three by this master, and Beethoven's Sonata in C minor (Op. 30), No. 2, for piano and violin, were the concerted works. Miss Zimmermann played pieces by Schumann, and Signor Piatti gave his favourite Boccherini Sonata in A. Mr. Ernest Birch was deservedly applauded for his rendering of airs by Scarlatti, Buononcini, and Schubert. On the following Monday the chief attractions were Beethoven's great Quartet in C sharp minor (Op. 131) and Bach's Chaconne, played, as only he can play it, by Herr Joachim. Miss Fanny Davies contented herself with a couple of Schumann's least interesting trifles, but as usual won an encore. Mr. Thorndike was an acceptable vocalist in place of Mr. Edward Lloyd. Of the reappearance of Madame Schumann, and the final Concerts of the season, we must speak in our next number.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

The first Concert of the seventy-fourth season was given on the 4th ult., at St. James's Hall, before a large audience. There were but two novelties in the programme, the first an Orchestral Scene, by Mr. Henry Gadsby, called "The Forest of Arden," and the second a Violin Concerto by Moszkowski. Perhaps Mr. Gadsby acted wisely in limiting himself to the two suggestive headings for the movements of his work, "An Autumn Morning" and "The Hunt's up," for undoubtedly had he labelled every phrase with the scene or incident which it was designed to illustrate, the abstract merit of his composition would have suffered from the desire of his hearers to discover whether Shakespeare's poetry was duly reflected in the music. As the composer tells us that he merely desired to "determine the mood" in which the audience should listen to his work, we may at once say that, judged according to his own direction, he may credit himself with a very fair amount of success. We have little hesitation in awarding a higher amount of praise to the first than to the second movement; but this may be partially traceable to the fact of the conventional nature of "hunting music," which even in its commonest form can scarcely be mistaken. "The Autumn Morning" is graceful and refined throughout, delicately scored, and treated with musicianlike feeling, the second theme, especially, arresting the attention by its tunelessness and sympathy with the subject of the work, and a well written Coda bringing the movement to a highly effective termination. Warm and well deserved applause was awarded to the composer, who conducted, at the conclusion of the work, which in all respects received an excellent rendering. M. Tivadar Nachéz, who played the solo part of Moszkowski's Violin Concerto, had a hard task in preventing a work of such inordinate length from wearying the audience; but his skilful execution and unflagging energy compensated largely for the absence of interest in the music itself, and he was rewarded by a storm of applause which at least proved that he had fairly won the good opinion of his hearers. Of course there may have been some who, like ourselves, could scarcely resist a wince when the intonation was absolutely faulty; but a virtuoso like M. Nachéz has a happy knack of covering his few defects by his many merits, and certainly much of his performance exhibited the highest artistic qualities. The best portion of the Concerto is undoubtedly the slow movement, which, although somewhat rhapsodical, is extremely melodious and expressive. Both the first and last movements are excessively tedious, elaborate passages taking the place of that thematic material which, even unskilfully wrought out, is positively necessary to sustain the interest in a work of such pretension. Schumann's Pianoforte Concerto was carefully played by Madame Frickenhaus, and Mlle. Antoinette Trebelli in Mozart's "Deh vieni" and "Ah, je veux briser ma chaîne" (from "Les Diamants de la Couronne") was exceedingly well received. Especial mention must be made of the performance of Mendelssohn's "Scotch" Symphony, and Cherubini's Overture to "Les Deux Journées," under the admirable conductorship of Sir Arthur Sullivan, who on no occasion has more incontestably proved his perfect mastery over the orchestra. The second Concert, on the 18th ult., commenced with an absolutely faultless performance of Mr. E. Proust's Symphony in F, which since its production at the last Birmingham Festival has gained a large amount of popularity, and earned for its composer a high position amongst the now rapidly increasing creative musical artists of England. Familiarity with this work not only strengthens, but materially adds to, our already recorded impressions of its merits; and Mr. Prout (who conducted) must have felt much gratified at the applause elicited by each movement, and his double recall at the conclusion of the Symphony. Signor Bottesini's Overture "Graziella," which opened the second part (under the conductorship of the composer) is new to these Concerts, and forms a Prelude to an Opera of which little more than an act is completed, on the same subject as that upon which Sir Julius Benedict wrote a Cantata for the Birmingham Festival of 1882. Thoroughly reflective of sunny Italy, the Overture is decidedly popular in character, though unmistakably touched with the hand of a finished artist. The slow introduction on the melody intended for the theme of Graziella's prayer in the last act, first given out by the oboe, with wind accompaniment, is eminently suggestive; and there is much freshness, both in the materials used and their treatment throughout the Allegro. The Overture was warmly and deservedly applauded. It was fortunate that two of the orchestral works were conducted by their composers, for the labours of Mr. George Mount—who, in consequence of the indisposition of Sir Arthur Sullivan, undertook the conductorship of the Concert at very short notice—were thus lightened. Mozart's Concerto in D minor was rendered with much refinement—and we are glad to say with the music before him—by M. de Pachmann; and Signor Bottesini delighted all who care more than we do for the successful vanquishing of difficulties by a performance on the double-bass of his "Introduction and Bolero," for which he had expressly written an orchestral accompaniment. Vocal pieces were given by Mr. and Mrs. Henschel with their usual success; and Mr. Mount must be congratulated on his careful conducting of the music which fell to his share, including Beethoven's fine Overture "Die Weihe des Hauses."

THE BACH CHOIR.

THE Concert given by this justly esteemed Society in St. James's Hall, on Thursday, the 25th ult., was in every respect a conspicuous success, the programme being varied and interesting, and the rendering of the several items such as to give credit to the executants, and to the new Conductor, Dr. Villiers Stanford. The great master after whom the choir is named was represented by his Cantata "Gott ist mein König," a work of more than ordinary significance to those who study the career and art labours of Bach. It dates from 1708, when the composer was but twenty-three years old, and had just been appointed organist at Muhlhausen. It was customary to have a musical celebration at the annual change of the Town Council and it was Bach's duty to provide a work suitable for the occasion. The words of this Cantata are a mixture of Scriptural texts and verses from hymns, and are meant to refer first to the outgoing and then to the incoming Councillors. An exhaustive critical analysis will be found in the first volume of Spitta's Biography, to which we refer all who are curious on the subject. The general listener must be struck with the unusual fullness and variety of the scoring, the instruments being divided into four groups—namely, three trumpets and drums, two flutes and a violoncello, two oboes and a bassoon, and two violins, viola, and bass. But though Spitta draws attention to the superiority of the Cantata to those of Buxtehude, he does not fail to indicate its defects, which are those of youth and inexperience. "In estimating this Cantata throughout, we must necessarily use the standard which the master gives us in his own best works. When compared with the works of his predecessors, it is seen to be for the most part far above them, and never below them. But in many places we find things of a quite new and original type, too decidedly conspicuous for this comparison to be wholly just." Though not worthy to compare in depth of expression, or brilliancy of contrapuntal device, with the Leipzig works, this "Rathwechsel" Cantata was well worthy of a hearing. Another novelty was Beethoven's "Elegischer Gesang," for strings and choir (Op. 118), a trifling piece written on the death of the wife of the composer's friend, Pasqualatti, in 1814. Though not unworthy of the master, it is not, in any way, a noteworthy example of his genius.

The beautiful and poetical third part of Schumann's music to "Faust" brought the Concert to a fitting termination. Herr Joachim's solos gave as marked a contrast to the choral portion of the programme as could possibly be desired. The violinist gave his own Hungarian Concerto and Bach's Chaconne in his very finest manner, and fairly roused the aristocratic audience to enthusiasm.

BOW AND BROMLEY INSTITUTE.

THE excellent performance of "Mors et Vita" given by this Society at its last Concert was followed up by the production, on the 9th ult., of two more of the Birmingham Festival novelties—Cowen's "Sleeping Beauty" and Prout's Symphony in F. The latter work, conducted by the composer, formed the pièce de resistance of a miscellaneous first part, and met with the unstinted appreciation which its happy mixture of learning and lucidity has never failed to command. Of the four movements the graceful Intermezzo à l'Espagnole—a heading which has induced some amateurs to miscall the Symphony Spanish—seemed to please most, and narrowly escaped an encore. Mr. Prout was twice recalled at the close of the finale, played with great spirit by the efficient orchestra of forty performers led by Mr. Leverett Frye. Mendelssohn's setting of the 114th Psalm, "When Israel out of Egypt came," gave the excellent body of voices under Mr. McNaught's bâton opportunities for distinction of which they fully availed themselves; but the excessive speed at which the movements were taken undoubtedly detracted from the dignity of the work. Of Mr. Lloyd's singing of Gounod's "Lend me your aid" it is enough to say that where the needs of a composition are so fully answered by the resources of the executant, the result is not far short of perfection. "Creation's Hymn," as rendered by Miss Hilda Wilson, served to exhibit the musicianly qualities as well as the fine voice of this lady. The second part of the Concert was occupied by the performance of "Sleeping Beauty," in which, besides the vocalists already mentioned, Mrs. Hutchinson and Mr. Henry Pope took part. Mrs. Hutchinson has been heard to greater advantage in the music assigned to the Princess, the impassioned passages in which seemed on this occasion to fatigue her voice. The recitatives and quiet phrases, however, were given with her wonted finish and sympathetic style. The vocal feature of this, as of every other performance of the work in which he has taken part, was Mr. Lloyd's rendering of the long scena "Light, light at last," which called forth such a demonstration as to render the composer's prohibitory "attacca subito" at the end of the scena perfectly nugatory. The ballad, one of the best and most original numbers in the work, was given with great breadth of style by Miss Hilda Wilson, and made a deep impression; while in the small part of the King, Mr. Henry Pope gave thoroughly efficient aid. Choir and orchestra, although not perfect, acquitted themselves extremely well. The dainty chorus for female voices "Draw the thread," the waltz, the choral interlude "Sleep," and the final chorus were all sung with intelligence and a fair observance of light and shade. Perhaps the attack might have been a little firmer in some of the more difficult numbers. The orchestra, except for a few cases of unsteadiness and an occasional roughness, played the delicate accompaniments well, the intermezzo "Maidenhood and Dreams of Love" being perhaps their most successful effort. At the risk of seeming ungracious to an excellent choirtrainer and enthusiastic musician, we feel obliged to point out that Mr. McNaught's efficiency as a Conductor would be increased were he to abandon the habit—possibly unconscious—of striking his desk with his bâton. Such a practice supplies a piece of orchestral colouring which not being in the score cannot but displease the composer, and from its unmusical sound must annoy the listener. Mr. Cowen, who was present, was called to the platform amidst hearty applause, and must have been highly pleased with the flattering reception accorded to his work.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

A CHAMBER Concert was given by the students of this institution on the 10th ult., at St. James's Hall, before a large audience. The excellent system of training pursued in the Academy was amply manifested, the pianists being represented, among others, by Miss Ethel Boyce, in her graceful "Album Leaves," by Mr. J. W. Kipps in Beethoven's Thirty-two Variations, and by Mr. Septimus B. Webbe, who gave a fine rendering of a Nocturne by Chopin and a Study by Liszt. Cowen's song "Sweetest eyes were ever seen," sung by Miss Ellen Haas, Mrs. O'Leary's song "I am the Angel," most artistically given by Miss Marian Ellis, and Miss Selina Quicke in a "Love song" by Amy Horrocks (student) deserve honourable mention; and Mendelssohn's "Surrexit Pastor bonus" displayed the quality of the female choir to the utmost advantage.

MR. FREDERIC LAMOND'S RECITAL.

THOSE who went to Prince's Hall on the afternoon of the 26th ult., to wonder at the prowess of the young Scotch virtuoso, Frederic Lamond, stayed to admire. The curiosity often experienced in witnessing the début of juvenile performers gave way to a finer feeling when it was discovered that this lad of seventeen could, in point of execution, throw down the gage to any contemporaneous artist. The only parallel case within our recollection is that of another British artist—Arabella Goddard—though she was even younger than Mr. Lamond when she took the world by storm. Female intelligence (or, the intelligence of females) develops sooner than in the opposite sex; and so, perhaps, Mr. Lamond's achievements come close upon those of Miss Goddard. To listen to the Scotch youth's playing is to be at once impressed with the fact that his fingers cannot go wrong, and that the most intricate music presents no hardships for those wonderful hands. From first to last, in a selection unusually trying, not a single slip of any sort was discernible, and the mere mechanical work was simply faultless. Mr. Lamond plays entirely from memory, but this is not the gift which some people assume it to be. If we consider the number of consecutive hours expended upon the practice of each work presented to public approval, we shall become aware that the difficulty would be to forget rather than to remember. In solo playing a slip, if it should occur, is not specially remarkable; in concerted music, of course, the reliance upon mnemonic retentiveness is inexcusable. The programme of the first Recital given by Mr. Lamond comprised Beethoven's Sonata in C minor (Op. III); twenty-eight Variations on a theme of Paganini by Johannes Brahms (Op. 35)—a very poor and tedious composition, unrelieved by any of those flashes of genius which we are accustomed to find in the German master's works; Chopin's Ballade (No. 3) in A flat, Impromptu, Berceuse, and Polonaise in A flat; Schumann's Etudes Symphoniques; Rubinstein's Barcarole; a Romance by F. Lamond, and Liszt's Liebestraum and Fantasia on "Lucrezia Borgia." With the details of the performance we need hardly deal—we have covered the ground already when we say that Mr. Lamond was excellent in all, and that every school of composition seemed equally well fitted to his powers. His Beethoven was as truly classical as his Chopin was graceful and poetic; his reading of Schumann brought out the idiosyncrasies of the master in their best light; and the remaining pieces found the player fully competent to deal with them. We do not contend that Mr. Lamond is yet a finished pianist, or that he is a marvellous executant, but there are higher qualities of feeling and expression which age and experience alone can give. Still, he is by far the finest performer which this generation has seen, and it can be readily surmised that his second and third Recitals will command that amount of general interest which is only displayed in the cases of famous artists. We can perfectly believe that to hear Frederic Lamond once, is not to know him fully; and we shall return to the subject after further acquaintance with this extraordinary young pianist.

MISS AGNES ZIMMERMANN'S RECITAL.

THIS highly accomplished pianist gave an interesting Recital on the 25th ult., at Prince's Hall, Piccadilly, with a very comprehensive programme, ranging over the entire field of pianoforte music, and taxing to the utmost the versatile powers as well as those of physical endurance of its exponent. Miss Agnes Zimmermann commands both in an eminent degree, in addition to great mechanical skill, and that not very easily definable gift of sinking her individuality into that of the composer whose work she interprets, and which is called, in a general way, "poetic feeling." This she again manifested in a striking manner at the Concert under notice, in pieces by Bach, Gluck, Graun, Rameau, Scarlatti, the more modern Schumann and Chopin, and the contemporary composers Rubinstein and Moszkowski, the performance thereby also assuming something of an historical character as illustrating the progress of the music written for the instrument. Beethoven was, as a matter of course, likewise represented—i.e., in one of his most important works written for the instrument, the Sonata in A major (Op. 101), of which the lady gave a most intellectual and worthy interpretation; another especially remarkable achievement having been her most refined and characteristic interpretation of Schumann's beautiful Fantasia in C (Op. 17), which, moreover, appeared to illustrate in an admirable manner the artistic significance of the otherwise somewhat obscure superscriptions which the composer has given to its movements, such as "durchaus phantastisch und leidenschaftlich vorzutragen" (to be played throughout fantastically and passionately). The latter portion of Miss Zimmermann's programme introduced a composition by herself entitled "Spring Melody," a charming trifle, carrying with it something of the freshness and fragrance of early blossoming flowers, and which the audience insisted upon hearing again. The selection concluded with a brilliant performance of one of Schubert's Marches Militaires in Tausig's arrangement. The Hall was well filled.

MISS FANNY DAVIES'S RECITAL.

It is too soon to sum up the current musical season, but, if appearances may be trusted, it will deserve to be remembered as the pianists' year. Foreign executants of the first rank are visiting us in unusual numbers, and from our own people young artists are appearing who bid fair to hold their own against all comers. Miss Fanny Davies has now been with us long enough to enable us to say that she may fearlessly challenge comparison with her Continental rivals. If any doubt remained, it must have been dispelled by her Recital at the Prince's Hall, on Wednesday, the 24th ult. The splendid technique and high artistic intelligence she brought to bear upon such works as Beethoven's Sonata in A (Op. 101) and Schumann's Carnaval absolutely disarmed criticism. It was pianoforte playing of the most acceptable kind, free from any trace of affectation, but full of warmth, feeling, and intellectuality. The minor items of her programme were equally well rendered, and the large audience showed its satisfaction by remaining to the very last bar.

MR. HERMANN FRANK'S CONCERTS.

It is obvious that the absence of one artist from an associated company of performers, whether vocal or instrumental, must be detrimental to the general effect. If one member suffer, all the members suffer in like manner, for the ensemble is necessarily destroyed. This was the case at the third of the above Concerts, on the 9th ult., the soprano, Miss Hamlin, in Mr. Frank's vocal quartet, being absent through illness. Her place was taken by Miss Thekla Friedländer, who is entitled to lenient criticism under the circumstances. Nevertheless, it must be stated that the rendering of the concerted works left very much to desire. The second set of Brahms's Liebeslieder Walzer especially suffered by the general coarseness and lack of refinement of the executants. Dr. Hubert Parry's vigorous and extremely well written Pianoforte Trio in E minor was fairly well rendered by Messrs. E. Dannreuther, E. Mahr, and B. Albert, and the violinist introduced a paraphrase of "The Good Friday Melody" from "Parsifal," the effect of which, however, was lost with a piano accompaniment and apart from its surroundings.

At the last Concert of the present series, on the 23rd ult., the conditions were reversed, the instrumental part of the programme being very unsatisfactory, while the vocal quartet appeared to greater advantage than at any of the previous performances. The second set of Brahms's Waltzes are certainly not equal to the first, but they improve greatly on acquaintance, and being tastefully sung were received with much favour. On the other hand, we never remember to have heard such a bad performance in a public Concert-room as that of Mozart's Quintet in D. Under the circumstances, it will be as well not to name the performers, some of whom are individually capable executants; but we trust that Mr. Franke will see the advisability of rendering impossible the recurrence of such a discreditable feature in his enterprise. Herr Julius Röntgen might wisely have selected something better for his first appearance as a pianist than his "Variations on Hungarian Czárdás," which, however clever, are of no real musical value. The audience insisted upon an encore, probably in the hope of hearing the Amsterdam musician in something more interesting, but if so they were disappointed, for he gave a silly transcription of Bach's Organ Toccata in F. Herr Röntgen's technical powers are considerable, but more than that it is as yet impossible to say in his favour. Mr. Franke states that the Concerts have been very successful, and that a further series will be given during the season.

THE LISZT FESTIVAL AT LIÉGE.

THE Independence Belge, of the 19th ult., gives the following account of Liszt's recent visit to Liège, which may be of special interest in view of his approaching visit to London:—

"It was some forty years since Liszt had been at Liège, but he had not forgotten the reception which he had met in that town. When he came to Brussels in June, 1881, at the banquet which was given in his honour after the Festival of the Palais des Académies, he recalled how, at the time of the Grétry fêtes, the Minister of Muelenaere had decorated him in the public square of Liège. This time the reception was of a more private character; but if the renowned virtuoso voluntarily eclipsed himself, the composer at least had the pleasure of hearing his works given by artists of reputation, and enthusiastically applauded by a select public. . . . Liszt received an ovation after the Credo of his 'Graner Mass,' a work which made a deep impression. He was also obliged to appear on the platform. The Liège Conservatoire was represented by an offering of a golden palm to the master."

"The 'Graner Mass' was splendidly sung by the following soloists: Mesdames Fick-Wery and de Saint Moulin, Messrs. Caillet and Davreux, and by a chorus of splendid voices and good style. The orchestra of Liège acquitted itself satisfactorily under the intelligent conductorship of M. Hutoy, and the master appeared on the whole very well satisfied."

"Mlle. de Saint Moulin scored a success in the second part of the Concert, by her rendering of the 'King of Thule,' and she also sang a setting of Victor Hugo's charming lines: 'S'il est un charmant gazon.'"

"As to Madame Falk-Mehlig, who played the second Concerto in A, and the Hungarian Fantaisie, with orchestra, she came off with triumph. Her energy, the verve of her style, and her perfect technique, literally carried the audience away. She was recalled four times."

From Liège Liszt passed onwards to Antwerp, and thence to Paris. His next movements will soon be known to the London world.

A PARIS PERFORMANCE OF "SLEEPING BEAUTY."

THE performance in France of an important work by an English composer is a matter of such rare occurrence as to render its actual accomplishment in itself a distinguished achievement. It is time, indeed, the prejudice still prevalent among our French neighbours against the musical capacity of this country were removed, and a wider field opened for the assertion of our best native productions abroad. No civilised nation can afford to be ignored in its artistic products and strivings by any other, and every departure from its apparent indifference shown by the French capital should be welcomed as a step nearer to that general recognition which English music will doubtless eventually meet. The latter prediction it is the safer to make where so charming and amiable a work is concerned as Mr. Cowen's Cantata "Sleeping Beauty," which, under the French title of "La Belle au Bois Dormant," was performed on the 4th ult. by the Concordia, a Choral Society composed of amateurs resident in Paris, which has acquired a considerable reputation for the production of modern as well as classical music. Mr. Cowen himself conducted his work, the soloists being Mesdames Fuchs and Lalo, MM. Bugnet and Audan; all of them excellent vocal artists. "The Cantata," says a correspondent of the Times, "has been presented to the Parisian public in a very perfect manner, and much applause was bestowed on its correct style, original harmony, and affecting passages. The passage, 'Spring from the earth, red rose,' by Madame Lalo; the tenor solo, 'Light,' by M. Bugnet; the soprano solo, 'Where am I?' by Madame Fuchs; and the grand final chorus, 'At dawn of day,' were warmly applauded." Similar favourable opinions respecting the work find their expression in French journals, the Ménestrel regarding it as "an important production, written with the greatest care, and exempt from radical tendencies." In a recent number of the Paris Temps, a review of the score is published, the author of which has formed a high opinion of the merits of the work which, he thinks, "possesses all the requisite charm and simplicity inherent in the subject." Among the numbers considered specially characteristic by this critic are the airs, "Pure as thy heart" and "Whither away," the valse, and the instrumental portions generally. The libretto has been translated into French by Miss Augusta Holmes, herself an excellent musician. We shall be glad to hear that the example thus set by the Concordia is being followed by other musical societies in France.

"FIDELIO" IN ROME.

IN a recent article on the "Florentine Trio" I noticed the great and lamentable decline of classical music throughout Italy, except in some of the Northern Cities, such as Milan, Turin, and Bologna. And, assuredly, if proof were wanted, I need only point to the performances of "Fidelio" which took place at the Apollo Theatre in Rome, at the beginning of February last. It will hardly be believed, but it is only too true, that this was actually the first production of Beethoven's immortal opera, certainly in Rome, if not in Italy. This fact in itself tells its own tale; but what is still less to the credit of the Eternal City is that the production of that masterpiece should have proved a failure, an unmistakable, indisputable failure. In this respect "Fidelio" shared but the fate that has before now overtaken nearly every classical opera, such as Mozart's "Don Giovanni," or the "Nozze di Figaro," whose production has from time to time been attempted in Italy; but that even the so-called musical critics of some of the leading Roman papers should unblushingly confess their inability to "understand that kind of music," and should deprecate any attempt to produce in Rome such works as "Fidelio," is surely too disgraceful, and is the best proof of the deplorable condition to which the Muse is reduced in the country of her birth.

One paper says that "if 'Fidelio' were not written by Beethoven, the public would probably not have listened even to the first act." Another paper states that everybody in the house "was bored to death, though it would have been impolite to confess it." Yet another critic avers that the merits of "Fidelio" are purely "archaeological"; whilst another brilliant writer, after innocently asking what could possibly have induced the impresario to put "Fidelio" on the stage, arrives at the conclusion that the said impresario made three fatal mistakes: "the first, to give 'Fidelio' at all; the second, to give it badly; and the third, to give it more than once."

There is, however, one laudable exception to this chorus of wholesale condemnation, to this woeful display of truly childish ignorance; and that exception is Signor d'Arcais, a Roman musical critic of great and deserved standing, who in plain terms cries shame on the performance, shame on the public, and on the servile press for their want of classical taste; and who has the courage to point out that whatever the revival and progress of Italy in other respects, in classical music there certainly is none; and that by so tardily producing an opera like "Fidelio," a standard work of every respectable répertoire outside Italy; and, what is more, by allowing such a work to prove a failure in Rome, the Capital, his countrymen simply make themselves the laughing-stock of other nations.

The failure of "Fidelio" in Rome is not, however, attributable solely to the utter want of appreciation of Beethoven's dramatic music on the part of the public. It is also due in a great measure to the second-rate character of the artists, and of the vocal part of the performance as a whole; and to the notoriously imperfect and slovenly way in which operas are generally rehearsed in Italy. In other countries the greatest care is bestowed on the rehearsals, which frequently extend over three consecutive months, so as to ensure the maximum of perfection, and hence success at the first performance in public. In Italy, on the contrary, the impresario, in the majority of cases, cannot afford the expense of frequent rehearsals. Hence a given work is often put on the stage before the several artists and performers know their parts even fairly well; there is rarely such a thing as an efficient ensemble; the first few performances are really public rehearsals more than anything else; and a fair estimate of the merits of a work new to the audience can therefore never be formed on its first production. Add to this that the extreme delicacy of light and shade, and the undoubtedly very difficult vocal music of "Fidelio," require a most refined rendering, and hence first-rate artists; and it will be easily understood why the audience at the Apollo in Rome completely failed to realise the transcendent merits and beauty of "Fidelio" as an opera.

There is yet another reason which accounts for a good deal of the almost icy indifference with which "Fidelio" was received in Rome, and it is this, that to understand a work of this kind, as indeed all classical music worthy of that name, the first requisite in the hearer is thoughtful attention. Now, ninety-nine out of a hundred Italians go to the opera, certainly not to think, rarely to listen, but chiefly to talk. Indeed, it is said that the only occasion on record when the audience of the Apollo resigned themselves, as it were under moral compulsion, to sitting through an entire performance in religious silence, was that of the production of the "Nibelungen" cycle a few years ago, under the quasi-patronage of Queen Margherite, in honour of Princess Isabella of Bavaria, on the first visit of the latter to Rome as the bride of the Duke of Genoa, the Queen's brother. The strain on the patience and attention of an Italian audience, of all others, must indeed have been extreme; at all events, the "Nibelungen" cycle has not been given since; and the only one of Wagner's operas that, besides "Rienzi," has at all taken root on the principal stages in Italy is "Lohengrin," whereas "Tannhäuser" is spoken of as one of the "novelties" to be produced in Rome this season.

No doubt it should be borne in mind that a nation whose musical genius produced the melodies of Bellini and Donizetti, is naturally slow to warm to and grasp the essentially manly and gothic character of the music of the North, although Verdi in his later works, as well as Boito and Ponchielli, have done much to bridge over the gulf which was fixed between the two opposing schools. No doubt, an opera translated, and produced under entirely different conditions, in a different atmosphere, under a different sky, loses much, sometimes the whole, of its national character; and this is quite as true of a typically and intensely Italian opera like Rossini's "Barbiere" as it is of Wagner's operas. But there are certain operas, masterpieces of classical art in the true acceptance of the term, such as Gluck's, Mozart's, and Cherubini's operas and Beethoven's "Fidelio," which are a possession of all times, and are, or ought to be, also a possession of all nations. Yet it is a melancholy fact that, in spite of the many admirable and effective Italian versions, none of the operas of those great masters, Cherubini himself not excepted, can be said ever to have found a home in Italy; and although Rome can in no sense be said to lead the taste and culture of music in Italy, the recent failure of "Fidelio" is, nevertheless, not only discreditable in itself, but augurs ill for the future.

"THE ROSE OF SHARON" AT TORONTO.

THE performance of Mr. Mackenzie's Oratorio by the Philharmonic Society of Toronto, under the able conductorship of Mr. F. H. Torrington, on February 16, was a decided success. The work had evidently been most carefully prepared, and all concerned in its presentation before a critical audience have a right to share with the indefatigable Conductor the credit of achieving so triumphant a result. An elaborate analysis of the Oratorio is given in the Toronto Mail, and the varied and sympathetic treatment of every portion of the work by the composer most warmly eulogised. From this well written critique we quote the following passage, with regret that space will not allow us to extract a few of the carefully considered opinions upon the various numbers: "The composer in carrying out the design of the Oratorio exhibits a great amount of musicianly scholarship, striking power of invention, and a remarkable command of orchestration. The traditional treatment of Oratorio is respected in the combination of numerous and elaborate choruses, contrapuntal writing, and fugal episodes." The Toronto Evening News says "A very large audience greeted the Philharmonic Society at the Pavilion Music Hall last night on the occasion of the first performance in Toronto of Mackenzie's dramatic Oratorio, 'The Rose of Sharon.' The work will take rank with the best compositions of the day, abounding as it does with fine solos, excellent choruses, and capital orchestration. The music shows an apt conception of the theme chosen"; and the Globe (Toronto), after speaking of the Oratorio in the highest terms, and awarding warm praise to the principal vocalists—Mrs. Gertrude Luther, Mrs. Mackelean, Messrs. Mockridge, H. M. Blight, E. W. Schuch, and A. E. Curran—concludes with the following paragraph: "The success scored by Mr. Torrington in this Concert is a very marked one. The amount of labour expended in overcoming the great difficulties throughout the work must have been enormous. The skill requisite to produce the Oratorio satisfactorily can be appreciated only by competent musicians. But the satisfaction of signal success in this instance must be so great as to be in itself a sufficient reward."

OBITUARY.

IN Louis Köhler, whose death occurred on February 16, at Königsberg, Germany has lost one of her ablest and most conscientious musical teachers, and musical art generally a most devoted and hard working disciple. He was, as a German writer aptly remarks, the Czerny of our time, besides being a versatile, yet solid, critical author, and much esteemed also as a composer. Köhler was born in 1820, at Brunswick, and commenced his artistic career as orchestral conductor in several provincial towns of Prussia. He eventually took up his domicile at Königsberg, where, in 1847, he founded a Musik-Schule, and with which period begins his extraordinary activity as a teacher, and his equally remarkable fertility as an author, a number of books and pamphlets of both didactic and æsthetic import proceeding from his pen in the course of time, not to mention numerous interesting journalistic contributions on subjects connected with the progress of the art; for Köhler was distinctly an adherent of the progressive or "New German" school, as represented by Wagner and Liszt, he being one of the very first and staunchest supporters of the theories promulgated by the former, and having remained till the last on terms of close friendship with Liszt. Indeed, his very last article (published in the Neue Zeitschrift für Musik last month) is devoted to the latter, being a "Fantasia upon the theme 'Liszt,'" a theme upon which he would never weary, and which is here treated in a very attractive manner, both as regards the executive and the creative achievements of the pianist-composer, maintaining no doubt justly that the creative faculty, at all times predominant in Liszt, has ever imparted to his pianoforte interpretations that unique character which has so frequently been remarked upon but which it is not easy to define. Köhler was, together with Liszt, Ambros, Brendel, and a few other prominent musicians, one of the founders of the "Allgemeine Deutsche Musikverein," the representative Society of German musicians. As a dramatic composer Köhler can scarcely be said to have been successful, but his pianoforte compositions possess lasting merit, and it will be a long time before his excellent "Etudes" (Op. 112), or his "Grosse Clavierschule" (Op. 300), will come to be superseded; at any rate, they are universally esteemed in the present day as forming most valuable adjuncts to the study of pianoforte playing. Among Köhler's older pupils may be named Adolf Jensen, the eminent pianist and composer.

MUSIC IN BIRMINGHAM.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

GOUNOD's "Mors et Vita," which had not been heard in Birmingham since its production at the Festival of August last, was performed here by the members of the Festival Choral Society, on the 4th ult., with full band and chorus, and the following principals, viz. :—Miss Anna Williams, Miss Hope Glenn, Mr. Edward Lloyd, and Mr. Watkin Mills; Mr. Stockley, as usual, conducting. In order to meet exigencies of time and circumstance, and to adapt the work to the capacity of an ordinary orchestra, more particularly in the brass department, several movements of secondary importance were omitted, without materially impairing the general effect. With the exception of the Offertorium, the Prologue and Requiem were given in their entirety, but "The sleep of the Dead," and the awful "Judgment of the Rejected," were omitted apparently for orchestral reasons, and the performance was thus brought well within the limits of an ordinary Oratorio Concert. The sublimely solemn beauty of the Requiem grows upon the hearer with every repetition, and its charm was never more powerfully felt than on this occasion, when the choral section of the executive obtained a prominence which was scarcely possible at the Festival performance of the work. The soloists also gained in effect by the more perfect subordination of the instrumental accompaniments, which were, nevertheless, adequate for every legitimate purpose. The sweet, full, and powerful soprano voice of Miss Anna Williams was heard to great advantage in the melodious and pathetic solo "Felix culpa," and in the beautiful duet "Querens me," the lady found a sympathetic and competent associate in Miss Hope Glenn. Mr. Edward Lloyd sang the quaintly original tenor solo "Inter oves locum præsta" with great refinement and purity of intonation, and was not wanting either in fervour or vocal skill in the melodious Sanctus. Mr. Watkin Mills was fairly effective in the bass solos, but his singing is a little wanting in relief and contrast. No finer choral singing has been heard even in Birmingham for many a day than in the unaccompanied à capella movement, "A custodia matutina," in which the pitch was admirably preserved till the close; whilst for dramatic force and stern power of voice it would have been difficult to parallel the singing of the "Confutatis" and the "Tuba Mirum." In the latter part of the work, a word of praise is due to the admirable rendering of the quartet "Lacrymæ, dolor, mors," which was unquestionably one of the gems of the evening. The playing of the band throughout was at once spirited and judicious, though, for reasons already stated, some exceptional effects were not attempted.

On the afternoon of the 6th ult. the Madrigal Society connected with the musical section of the Midland Institute gave an interesting Concert, in the large lecture theatre of the Institution, to a numerous and appreciative audience. The Madrigal proper and its lighter companion the "Ayre" were represented by Croce's "Cynthia" and Dowland's "Awake, sweet love," the other choral pieces being part-songs, more or less modern. The best qualities of the choir were displayed in Henry Smart's "Cradle Song," which was sung with rare delicacy, if not with all the more nervous qualities which go to make up perfect part-singing. Mr. Gaul's "Daybreak," and Miss Prescott's quaint setting of "The Cryer," were also good examples creditably sung. Mr. G. Brewerton was specially successful in Sullivan's setting of "Edward Gray," and Mr. W. A. Brewerton, a young pianist new to Birmingham, produced a marked impression by his spirited and finished playing of a Polish dance by Scharwenka, a couple of familiar pieces by Henselt, Chopin's Mazurka in A flat (Op. 50), and Mendelssohn's Rondo Capriccioso, after which latter piece he was recalled.

Messrs. Harrison's fourth and final Concert, which took place in the Town Hall, on the 8th ult., made ample amends for the too obvious musical shortcomings of its predecessors, and the selection on this occasion was well worthy of the executive resources. The latter comprised, in addition to Mr. Charles Hallé's admirable band, with the Conductor himself as solo pianist, Madame Norman-Néruda as violin soloist, and Madame Patey and Mr. Watkin Mills, vice Signor Foli, indisposed, as vocalists. The orchestral pieces were remarkable rather for interest and excellence than for novelty, comprising the Overtures to "Egmont" (Beethoven) and "Ruy Blas" (Mendelssohn), Raff's "Lenore" Symphony in E, Liszt's Rhapsodie Hongroise (No. 1) in F, and Glinka's Russian Scherzo "Komarinskaja." Raff's grand Symphony, which was splendidly played, deeply impressed the audience by its romantic character and masterly elaboration; and in Liszt's melodious and ravishing "Rhapsodie Hongroise," which produced such a sensation at the last Birmingham Festival, the band scored another triumph, their playing of the piquant Mazurka theme, which constitutes the backbone of the work, being a marvel of delicacy, spirit, and precision. The personal and artistic interest of the Concert, however, centred in the violin playing of Madame Norman-Néruda, which in breadth of style, volume of tone, elegance and refinement of phrasing, and general perfection of technique, was certainly a marvellous exhibition. Nothing could exceed the finish and delicacy with which she played the elaborate chromatic passages of the cadenza in the Rondo from Vieuxtemps' Concerto in E major; but her great popular triumph was achieved in Wieniawski's Mazurka in G major (No. 1), a short, bright, sparkling movement, introduced by, and interwoven with, quaint drone effects, which pleased the audience so greatly that it had to be repeated. Mr. Charles Hallé played Chopin's Nocturne in F sharp (Op. 15, No. 2) and Grand Polonaise in A flat (Op. 53) with his accustomed refinement and with irreproachable skill. Madame Patey was more successful in Giordani's sweetly solemn song "Caro mio ben," which she had to repeat, than in the plaintive hymn of Gounod, "There is a green hill," which is scarcely so well suited to her style or voice. Mr. Watkin Mills, who replaced Signor Foli at short notice, was most effective in the air "Non più andrai," from Mozart's "Figaro."

The Pianoforte and Violin Recital given on the 18th by Miss Margaret Wild and Miss Florence Donaldson, assisted by Mrs. Hutchinson, vocalist, was remarkable rather for the excellence of the performance than for the novelty of the selection, which latter comprised among other items such familiar favourites as Schumann's "Kreisleriana," Vieuxtemps's "Rêverie," Chopin's Barcarole in F sharp and Impromptu in A flat, and Grieg's Sonata in F, for piano and violin. The fair instrumentalists have lately completed their musical training together at Leipzig, and are therefore in perfect sympathy with one another, as was shown on this occasion, more particularly by their finished performance of the Grieg Sonata. Miss Wild has a firm, crisp touch, and considerable powers of expression, for which the Chopin selection afforded good scope. In the four examples of the "Kreisleriana"—the first two and the last two—she exhibited taste and fancy allied to considerable executive skill. Miss Florence Donaldson's violin playing was distinguished rather by grace and refinement than by virtuosity; but the lady's executive powers are quite equal to the demands of the music she attempts. Mrs. Hutchinson's vocal contributions, all distinguished by charm of voice and refinement and purity of style, comprised Maud Valérie White's song "Ye Cupids, droop," Purcell's "Nymphs and Shepherds," and Massenet's dainty "Elégie" and "Crépuscule," the latter sung sotto voce throughout.

The annual Concert of Madame Agnes Miller, which took place in the large lecture theatre of the Midland Institute on the 25th ult., attracted as usual an overflowing audience, whose satisfaction with the entertainment was testified by loud and frequent applause. The fair beneficiaire, who was assisted by Herr Ludwig Straus (violinist) and Miss Georgie Booth (vocalist), played Beethoven's Sonata in E flat (Op. 27), Brahms's Rhapsodie in G minor, Field's Nocturne in A, and a study by Scarlatti, displaying in each instance musical intelligence and technique of no mean order. Herr Straus especially charmed the audience in the Adagio from Brahms's Concerto in D and the Andante and Rondo from Vieuxtemps's second Concerto, and the two instrumentalists united their powers with excellent result in Schumann's Sonata in A minor and a couple of the Hungarian dances arranged by Brahms and Joachim. Miss Booth possesses an agreeable mezzo-soprano voice and sings with taste and expression.

On the 30th ult., Miss Fanny Davies gave a Pianoforte Recital, of which particulars must be reserved for a future occasion.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

IN the interests of the art, it is always regrettable if a musical venture, promoted with the object of maintaining the highest traditions which have been handed down, should, through lack of support, fall to the ground. A few months ago it was feared that this fate might overtake one of our foremost institutions, the Philharmonic Choral Society, and it has only been by dint of the bravest exertions that the Society has been able to weather the storm which threatened to swamp it. The collapse of such a Society would be a double loss to the city, inasmuch as it would disband a most capable body of voices, and would deprive the "masses," to whom the efforts of the Society were mainly directed, of hearing the greatest Oratorios rendered on a proper scale, and in an adequate manner. It is therefore extremely gratifying that by the two performances which have been given this season—"The Messiah," on December 27, and the "Creation," on February 26—the Philharmonic Choral Society has not only enhanced its special reputation from an artistic point of view, but has added an important amount to its exchequer, perhaps a more mundane consideration, but one of the most vital consequence to a Society without any other resource save the patronage of the public. The principals at the "Creation" performance were Madame Worrell (in the unavoidable absence of Miss Robertson), Mr. Ben Davies, and Signor Franco Novara, the admirable qualities of this combination being especially noticeable in the concerted music. Mr. Davies was also very successful in his finished rendering of the Recitative and Aria "In native worth." Mr. Randegger was at his post as Conductor, and Mr. W. T. Best showed to an exceptional degree his pre-eminence in being able to substitute on the organ with perfect grace and fluency the orchestral portion of the work.

The Hallé season is now finally concluded, and, as usual, the eighth Concert, which took place on the 2nd ult., had a special attraction, in the person of Herr Joachim. The great violinist's selections were Spohr's "Dramatic" Concerto in A minor, and Tartini's "Il Trillo del Diavolo." The Symphony at this Concert was Beethoven's No. 5 in C minor. Liszt's "Poème Symphonique," a perfect novelty to Liverpool, by its general structure and colouring created a favourable impression, and justified its place in the programme. Miss Marriott's selections were essentially classical, and included Mozart's "Zeffiretti" from "Idomeneo," and Wagner's "Elsa's Gesang."

On the 13th ult. Mr. Hallé gave a kind of addendum to his ordinary series by a Classical Chamber Concert in the small Concert-room of St. George's Hall. Mr. Hallé was assisted by Madame Norman-Néruda, and in the Septet by Messrs. Bernhardt, Grosse, Paersch, Hutchins, Vieuxtemps, and Prokatsky, and as the entire programme was made up of compositions by Beethoven, it is needless to say that, as regards quality as well as execution, the performance was of the highest excellence. The "Kreutzer" Sonata is often laid under contribution for excerpts, and it is pleasing to hear it played in its entirety by two such artists as Mr. Hallé and Madame Néruda. The Septet in E flat is subject to a similar remark, and it is seldom performed in its entirety probably because of its great length—although every movement is intensely interesting—and because it requires a combination of artists of superior talent. On the present occasion no such difficulties presented themselves, and the rendering of this magnificent work was beyond criticism. Mr. Hallé also played Beethoven's Sonata in E flat, and Madame Néruda contributed two Romances in exquisite style.

The Philharmonic Society has still another Concert before the conclusion of the season, and it is gratifying to be able to state that the most recent performances have shown rather an advance over their predecessors. At the tenth Concert, on February 23, the important orchestral features were Beethoven's Symphony No. 4 in B flat, Introduction to "Parsifal," a "Tragic" Overture by Brahms, the Entr'acte from "Die Folkweyer," and Handel's Concerto-Grosse in B minor, a sufficiently ambitious and comprehensive list. It is pleasant to record the reappearance of Mr. Santley at this Concert, with all his old verve and vigour, and in the "Wreck of the Hesperus," and his other more classical selections, he evidenced the retention of his artistic finish and, by the reception accorded him, his hold upon the public esteem.

"St. Paul" has always a special claim upon Liverpool, in view of its having been first presented to an English audience in this city just fifty years ago, and the choice of this Oratorio by the Philharmonic Society as one of its Lenten Concerts was a happy one. The performance on this occasion was a most admirable one in every way, and the choir sang carefully and intelligently throughout. The rendering of the chorals, a specialty of "St. Paul," was almost without a flaw. The band ably sustained the effort of the "practical" members, but was, if anything, a little too powerful for the choir in the more massive choruses. The soloists comprised Miss Mary Davies, whose method is specially suited to such a work as "St. Paul"; Miss Eleanor Rees, Mr. Harper Kearton, and Mr. Bridson.

A new departure in Chamber Concerts, in Liverpool, has been made by Mr. John Ross, a musician who, from his wide experience and sterling abilities, is deserving of all support. The idea which he has put into practical shape is that of giving a series of orchestral performances on Saturday afternoons, in the small Concert-room of St. George's Hall, the programmes being intended to strike a mean between Concerts of the severe classical type and those at which the enjoyment and pleasure of the "popular" element is the sole desideratum. In this effort Mr. Ross has, in the series of three performances already given, eminently succeeded, and it is perhaps regrettable that the lateness of the season will now necessitate a postponement of this experiment until the autumn. As the foundation of these Concerts, Mr. Ross has gathered around him a carefully selected and well balanced orchestra—particularly good in the string department, and some forty strong—and as specimens of their work, we may mention Dunkler's "Au bord de la Mer," Gustav Ernest's prize "Dramatic" Overture (first time in Liverpool), the entire music of the "Midsummer Night's Dream," Ponchielli's Ballet Music from "La Gioconda," &c. The artists at these Concerts have included Miss Nettie Carpenter, who merits a foremost place for the admirable qualities, both of power and execution, displayed in such items as Spohr's "Dramatic" Concerto and Mendelssohn's Concerto in E minor; and amongst vocalists the well-known names of Mr. Barton McGuckin, Mr. J. W. Turner, Mr. Seymour Jackson, and Mr. Edward Grime have appeared with their customary success.

MUSIC IN MANCHESTER.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

ON Monday, February 2, the distinguished organist of the Liverpool Corporation once more (after a prolonged absence) afforded us an opportunity of hearing him. For some years past the Directors of the Free Trade Hall Company have talked about removing the very incomplete instrument—originally built for the Art Treasures Exhibition at Old Trafford—and of their desire to erect an organ worthy of their splendid Concert-room, and one on which our most skilled players, and those eminent executants who may from time to time be pleased to visit us, may be satisfied to perform. Some hope was excited that Recitals on Sunday afternoons might be established—after the example set by the Municipal authorities in Liverpool—so that people not desiring to go to church three times a day might have some provision made for their comfort and rational recreation. It is now a not infrequent custom to throw open our church or chapel doors for what are called "Services of Song," and it would be difficult for the most bigoted to advance any serious argument against the gratification of the taste that would desire, in the middle of our weekly holiday, opportunities of listening to the tones of an instrument that must ever be invested with a somewhat sacred and solemn character.

It is a great pity that, after so long a delay, and after the announcement made some little time back that a design for a suitable instrument had been procured, a poor compromise has at last been effected, and that, instead of having a thoroughly representative instrument, upon which our cleverest players might have been willing to perform, we shall have to rest content with the mere patching up of the old organ, and such a slight enlargement as does not atone for its being placed further back. The extension of the platform space and the preservation of the strictest economy seem to have been the ideas controlling the alterations that have been made. Mr. Best, with his usual skill, exhibited the rejuvenated instrument, with which, doubtless, the builders (Messrs. Thorold and Smith) had done what they could under the restrictions imposed; but in the "St. Ann's" Fugue—although taken at a most judicious speed—the want of tone and the slowness of speech of the pedal registers were evident, and in Smart's "Grand Solemn March," and in other pieces of less importance, a lack of variety and of real wealth of timbre was felt.

Three evenings after Mr. Best's visit, Dr. Villiers Stanford's Oratorio, "The three Holy Children," was given here for the first time, under the best auspices, and with every provision made by Mr. Hallé for its complete success. Mr. Hecht had laboured with heartiest good will to secure the efficiency of the choir, and the work had been diligently rehearsed. The impression left, after an admirable performance under the direction of the composer, and the heartiest expressions of sympathy by the large audience, is that Dr. Stanford has succeeded in producing a scholarly and clever work, having no trace of triviality or want of thoughtful care. A certain skill in construction and of tact in contrasting effects the author evidently possesses, combined with very considerable power of orchestration. The short first part of the Oratorio contains many pleasing thoughts—especially a very broadly-phrased theme for soprano solo (carefully rendered by Miss Anna Williams) and for the ladies of the choir—and concludes with a really powerful, though somewhat desultory, chorus, "The heathen shall fear Thy name." In the second act the three "Children" are, perhaps, a little wearisome, but never undignified; and the climax of the work is marked by a double chorus—in which, however, there is no eight-part writing—of considerable power. It cannot be said that Dr. Stanford has written an Oratorio of dimensions, sustained power, variety, or attractiveness equalling those great works which we regard as models of highest excellence. But he must be congratulated upon having given us a very serious, earnest poem; upon having proved his ability to deliver with clearness and perspicuity his message; and upon having, in spite of an evident fondness for certain tricks of scoring not always grateful—such as the disagreeable staccato passages for the fagotti in the "Bel" chorus and elsewhere, and a too frequent muting of the strings—carefully studied the resources at his disposal, and the different modes of colouring and presenting his fancies which the enlarged modern orchestra affords.

The annual visit of Dr. Joachim attracted a large number of those faithful worshippers who recognise in the great violinist something much higher than a mere executant, something beyond a skilful interpreter of other men's thoughts. The programme, on the 4th ult., was rendered additionally interesting by a careful, though not unblemished, rendering of Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony, and by the juxtaposition of Svendsen's "Rhapsodie Norvégienne" in B, and Saint-Saëns's "Phaëton"—both played for the first time at Mr. Hallé's Concerts. As "Rhapsodies"—i.e., pieces loosely strung together—or as examples of diverse and powerful scoring, both were instructive; as exercises exhibiting the skill of Mr. Hallé's orchestra they were interesting; but as examples of constructive power they have little value. Miss Marriott's selection of songs—"Remorseless fiend" ("Abscheulicher") from "Fidelio," Mozart's "Zeffiretti" ("Idomeneo"), and Wagner's "Elsa's Gesang" ("Lohengrin")—showed ambition and great power of voice.

Mr. Hallé appropriately closed his twenty-eighth season by a performance of Gounod's "Mors et Vita," a work now so well known that I need report only its very tolerable performance. Miss Mary Davies was slightly over-weighted, but sang with judgment; Miss Hilda Wilson and Mr. Lloyd were very effective, and Mr. Watkin Mills made the most of his part.

On Saturday, the 8th ult., Mr. de Jong bade adieu to his supporters, who crowded to his annual benefit Concert to listen to Mr. Sims Reeves, to Signor Bottesini, and to those members of Mr. Carl Rosa's Opera Company (Madame Marie Roze, Miss Burton, and Mr. Athley Thomas) who obligingly filled up the gaps in the programme caused by the indisposition of several of Mr. de Jong's promised assistants.

At the Concert Hall the most interesting achievement during the month has been the introduction of Cowen's "Welsh" Symphony. Unfortunately, such was the inclemency of the evening of the 1st ult. that numbers of people were absolutely prevented attending to enjoy a programme including such an example of the power of an English composer, and enlivened by Madame Néruda's exquisite performance of Spohr's "Dramatic" Concerto and of the Adagio and Rondo from Vieuxtemps's Concerto in E. The fourth Symphony of one who has been recognised, not only in this country but in the brightest of Continental music-centres, as among the foremost of living artists should have been produced in the larger and more suitable hall wherein Mr. Hallé's Concerts are given. The Symphony in B flat is a work demanding and rewarding the greatest care. Its first movement is masterly in design and workmanship. The chief ideas are original and well contrasted; the second subject especially having a delightfully characteristic tinge, and being worked out with the greatest tenderness of instrumentation, and without the slightest danger of weariness to any minds consonantly attuned to its meaning or capable of yielding to its gentle influence. The orchestration of the Lento tranquillo (with its prominent use of the horns and clarinets) is in keeping with the delicate fancies of the themes upon which the movement is based. To the careless listener the liveliness and simplicity of the Scherzo appeal at once, and afford a relief, after the strained attention needed to grasp the full design of the previous movements of more complicated construction; but to the student the third section of the Symphony is interesting, chiefly on account of its transparent freshness and symmetry. As is too often the case, the Finale is the least successful portion of the whole; and, strangely enough, the introduction of the harp—however useful as an effect reserved for the climax of the Symphony—is not productive of any of that peculiarity of colouring which the title of the work suggests, and which is so charming in the earlier movements. In summing up the productions of the season, and in endeavouring to deduce its chief lessons, I shall have more to say about the "Welsh" Symphony. Here I will add only that no fresh work of the same calibre and merit has, of late, been introduced in Manchester.

But in opera, also, as well as in symphonic writings, has a triumph been gained by an English composer. We could not expect Mr. Carl Rosa to bring into the provinces the full strength of the band which in London exhibited so clearly Mr. Goring Thomas's skill in orchestration; and we are grateful to him for furnishing a complete, though necessarily smaller, body of instrumentalists. The part of Nadesda peculiarly suited Madame Valleria, who formed a true conception of the somewhat dreamy poetic character of the heroine, and conveyed to her hearers her idea with great delicacy and tact. Madame Georgina Burns's interpretation differed in every respect from that of her gentler predecessor. Mr. Barton McGuckin and Mr. Crotty sustained here their original parts; and the opera excited, at each of its three representations, very great enthusiasm, in spite of the fact that in several of the movements the climaxes were accelerated to a speed which destroyed all dignity and meaning. In the opening chorus the grace of the vocal themes, and even of much of the orchestration, was lost, the singers being utterly unable to gabble their words fast enough. This same mistaken idea of effect, the same restlessness of interpretation and continual working up to climaxes of noise and simulated intensity, spoiled many of the most earnest efforts of the leading singers of Mr. Rosa's company. Often how gratefully the ear would welcome a smooth vocal tone kept rigidly to a true pitch, and not forced to the sharpness which is supposed to depict emotion! When will our singers forsake the ranting style which is no longer tolerated in spoken drama?

In the "Bohemian Girl" (the 18th ult.) Mr. Seymour Jackson made his first appearance on the stage, and was warmly greeted by a crowded audience. As a singer he has very much to learn; as an actor everything. Endowed with a tenor voice of agreeable quality—rather sweet than powerful—Mr. Jackson would do wisely to devote himself with real energy to its cultivation and to the acquirement of musicianly knowledge. His first efforts should be to open his teeth, to let the tone come out freely, to enunciate distinctly, and to gain a bolder and more manly style of vocalisation. There is a wide field ready for him if he has zeal and determination. Marchetti's "Ruy Blas" and Maillart's "Fadette" I need not describe. Neither will excite any great or lasting interest.

Miss Amina Goodwin gave her second Pianoforte Recital this season at the Concert Hall, on Thursday, the 18th ult., playing with all her former brilliancy of execution, and with more definiteness of purpose.

MUSIC IN OXFORD.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

THE Lent Term has been unusually active in matters musical this year. Our new theatre was opened with great enthusiasm on February 13, when the musical arrangements were made by Mr. John Farmer, and the orchestra was led by Mr. G. H. Betjemann. Very soon afterwards, Mr. Henry Holmes and the string-players usually connected with him gave a Concert in the hall of Christ-church. The programme was not of remarkable interest, but succeeded in pleasing a large audience. On the 2nd ult. the Musical Union gave an Invitation Concert in Balliol College Hall, the attraction of which was the pianoforte performance of Mr. S. H. Waller, who played a programme of music ranging from Handel to Liszt in excellent style. As might be expected in a pupil of Liszt, he was most successful in the modern music. A word of praise is due to Messrs. Phillips and Ferguson, two undergraduate amateurs, for the manner in which they sang the songs set down for them. Amongst the other proceedings of our Chamber Music Societies we may mention that on February 23, Mr. Holmes and his associates played at the Musical Club, and that Mr. Farmer performed the pianoforte part in his Septet in D minor at the Musical Union on the same day.

Turning to choral music, we must first chronicle the inauguration of a new Society, the Oxford City Male Voice Union, which met for the first time at the beginning of the last month. A very large number of members have been enrolled, and the services of a rising young musician, Mr. H. B. Wilsdon, obtained as Conductor, so that there is every reason to predict a prosperous future for the venture.

On the 5th ult. the University Glee and Madrigal Society gave its second Concert, when a chorus in twelve parts, by Sir F. A. G. Ouseley, Bart., entitled "War, Wine, and Harmony," was performed for the first time, and produced a considerable effect. Miss Müller was very ill-advised to introduce a song of Schubert into a programme consisting of English music of the older school. Another point which called forth unfavourable criticism was the discrepancy between the programme, the book of the words, and the music really performed. The order of the programme seemed to be systematically neglected, and pieces which appeared in the book of the words were never performed. One singer was announced for one song in the programme, another in the book of words, and a third was actually sung. On this point more care should be exercised in future. To the chorus-singing there is scarcely anything but praise to be given, and of the Magdalen Quartet we can only say that they sang superbly. We are informed that the Society has presented its Conductor, Dr. Roberts, with a handsome bâton, to mark their appreciation of his services. If a Conductor is to be judged by the excellence of his choir, a compliment of this sort was never better deserved.

On the 16th ult. Handel's "Messiah" was performed by the Philharmonic Society, under somewhat unfavourable circumstances. The weather was most severe, and Mr. Edward Lloyd was unable to sing. A local tenor, Mr. Wright, of the Cathedral Choir, filled the vacant place with credit. The chorus, excepting the bass, was not good. Two days later, the Professor of Music gave the second of his series of Lectures on Spanish Church music. Some very beautiful illustrations, written by composers whose names were quite unfamiliar to English ears, were sung with great delicacy and refinement by the Professor's choir.

MUSIC IN THE WEST.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

THE month of March opened auspiciously from a musical point of view in Bristol with the first of the series of the six Concerts announced by the Monday Popular Concerts Society for the present season. Upon making his appearance on the orchestra, Mr. George Riseley, the honorary Conductor, was greeted with hearty and prolonged applause. The Concert was rendered especially interesting by the production of Mr. Prout's new Symphony, written for the late Birmingham Festival. This was conducted by the composer, who expressed himself much gratified with the manner in which the work was performed, and it was evident that the members of the band had spared no pains to make themselves thoroughly at home with it. The other items on the programme were Wagner's Overture "Die Meistersinger," Liszt's "Rhapsodie Hongroise," No. 1 in F, both admirably played; two short numbers from Mr. Cowen's Cantata "Sleeping Beauty," which we hope to hear fully given one day in this city; Weber's Overture "Der Freischütz," and a selection from "Il Trovatore." Handel's Largo in G was beautifully rendered by Mr. Carrington (violin), Mr. Cheshire (harp), and Mr. Riseley (organ), Mr. Prout conducting. The vocalists were Miss Mary Bliss and Mr. Lawford Huxtable, who each contributed two songs. Mr. Carrington was the leader of the band, as usual.

The last of Mrs. Viner Pomeroy's classical Chamber Concerts for the present season was given on the 3rd ult., at the Victoria Rooms, before a somewhat limited audience. The executants were Mr. H. Holmes (first violin), Mr. Michael Rice (second violin), Mr. Ellis Roberts (viola), Mr. J. Pomeroy (violinello), and Mr. Ralph Livings (pianoforte). The programme included Mozart's String Quartet, No. 1 in C major; Rubinstein's Trio in B flat for pianoforte, violin, and violinello; and Haydn's String Quartet in D major, No. 1; also four short pianoforte solos, in which Mr. Livings was very successful, though perhaps not so strikingly as at the previous Concert. In the Trio he did himself greater justice however, and we hope soon to have another opportunity of hearing him in Bristol. Both String Quartets went well, but not perfectly, and the Concert was hardly so interesting as usual.

It was followed the next evening by the annual Ladies' Night of the Orpheus Glee Society, when Colston Hall was full in every part. This Concert, one of the most popular of the year, fully sustained its character, and we can scarcely speak in too high terms of the excellence of the singing. The choir was well balanced, and consisted of sixty-seven voices in very even proportion, no one part being too prominent. The programme was as follows—Part 1: "Strike the Lyre" (Cooke), "Come, gentle zephyr" (Horsley), "I wish to tune" (S. S. Wesley), Serenade (J. G. Müller), "Ossian" (J. Beschmitt), "The Dying Child" (Viotta), "Martyrs of the Arena" (L. de Rille), "Ave Maria" (Abt), "Battle Song" (R. Schumann), "Comrades in Arms" (A. Adams); Part 2: "Non nobis Domine" (W. Byrd), "O Sanctissima" (Sicilian), "Shades of the Heroes" (Cooke), "Soldier's Love" (Kücken), "The Nightingale" (Weekles), "Peace" (J. F. Bridge), "When evening's twilight" (Hatton), "Banish, oh maiden" (Lorenz), "Sleep, gentle Lady" (Bishop). The solos were given in a very creditable manner by members of the Cathedral Choir, and though several encores were demanded none were given, the Conductor wisely refusing to break through his invariable rule. A slight fall in the pitch was noticeable in one or two of the numbers, particularly in the Serenade and towards the end of the evening, but otherwise the performance was almost beyond criticism. Mr. George Riseley conducted with his customary energy and skill.

Mr. Charles Hallé and Madame Norman-Néruda paid us a visit on the 9th ult., and gave a most delightful Pianoforte and Violin Recital at the Victoria Rooms, which made us earnestly wish that these talented musicians would oftener favour us with their presence. Mr. Hallé's touch seemed clearer and more delicate than ever, while Madame Norman-Néruda's wonderful playing frequently roused the audience to enthusiasm. The programme was well chosen, and included works of permanent interest.

The second of the Monday Popular Concerts was given on the 15th ult., on which occasion the Colston Hall was anything but full, and, indeed, the attendances at both the Concerts of this season augur badly for the financial result of the series. The programme opened with the Overture and Scherzo from the "Midsummer Night's Dream," beautifully played by the band, the captivating Scherzo quite taking the audience by storm. Beethoven's Second Symphony in D followed, and received a most intelligent and artistic rendering, each member of the band having evidently carefully studied his part. The weakness in the horns is an old defect, and sometimes sharply reminds one of its continued existence, and we would, of course, wish for an increased number of strings; but this deficiency the Bristolians do not seem inclined to supply. Mr. Walter Macfarren, who was received with warm applause, played his Concertstück for pianoforte and orchestra with his accustomed refinement and artistic feeling, and, being recalled, gave a Gavotte of his own composition. The prelude to "La Déluge" of Saint-Saëns was played for the first time in Bristol, and received an admirable rendering, as did also Paganini's "Il moto perpetuo," played by all the violins. The other items for the band were Auber's Overture "Le Maçon," and a Waltz by Lumbye. The vocalists were Miss Fryer, R.A.M., and Mr. W. Thomas, of Bristol Cathedral.

During Mr. W. Macfarren's visit to Bristol last month he gave a lecture at the Museum on "Pianoforte Writers, Past and Present," and also appeared as pianist at the last Popular Chamber Concert of the present season, at the request of his former pupil, Miss Mary Lock, who is the regular pianist at these gatherings. Mr. Macfarren contributed several solos, which it is needless to say were most warmly received, for he is now an established favourite in Bristol. Two trios by Raff and W. Macfarren were excellently given by Mr. Hudson (violin), Mr. Pavey (violin-cello), and Miss Lock (pianoforte). The vocalist was Miss Christine Chute, and the accompanist was Mr. Fred. Rootham. Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise," and Beethoven's Choral Symphony, formed the programme of the third Monday Popular Concert given on the 29th ult., of which a detailed notice will appear in our next letter.

At Exeter, on the 8th ult., a Pianoforte and Violin Recital was given by Mr. Max Pauer and Herr F. Zajic, in the Public Rooms. Both artists were new to Exeter, and were very favourably received. The programme comprised selections from the works of Beethoven, Bach, Schubert, Mendelssohn, Schumann, Chopin, Liszt, Spohr, Ries, Paganini, &c.

A Grand Festival Concert was given on the 8th ult., by the Bath School of Music Philharmonic Society, in the Assembly Rooms, Bath, when the great attraction was Sir Arthur Sullivan's "Martyr of Antioch," which was conducted by the composer. The orchestra consisted of forty-eight members, selected from the orchestra of the London Philharmonic Society, the leader being Mr. Carodus, and the Musical Director, Mr. Albert Visetti, who also conducted in the second part of the Concert. The chorus, numbering nearly 200, was that of the Bath Philharmonic Society, trained by Mr. Visetti. The solo vocalists were Miss Gertrude Griswold, Miss Grace Damian, Mr. Edward Lloyd, and Mr. Albert Reakes. The work of the chorus evidenced careful rehearsal, and the solos were admirably given, while of the band it is only necessary to say that it was thoroughly efficient, so that, musically speaking, at least, the Concert was a success.

The Plymouth Vocal Association gave a performance of "The Messiah" on Wednesday, the 17th ult., which was very successful. The solos were taken by competent members of the choir, and the choruses were splendidly rendered. Mr. Pardew led the orchestra, Mr. A. Faulf presided at the organ, and Mr. F. N. Löhr conducted.

MUSIC IN YORKSHIRE.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

MR. EDWARD MISDALE gave the last of his present series of Chamber Concerts in the Church Institute, on February 22. He has had an exceptionally short season, having only given three Concerts. He has, however, been well supported by the public, and the Concerts have been thoroughly successful in every respect. It is to be hoped that Mr. Misdale may see his way to enter boldly into an undertaking which has become a feature of the musical life of the town. Mr. Misdale was assisted at the Concert under notice by Mr. C. Henrich, jun.—a Bradford pianist of excellent parts—and Herr Alfred Giessing, a violoncellist from Berlin, who has recently settled in Leeds. With the assistance of Mr. Henrich the Concert-giver was able to produce two compositions such as are not often heard in this neighbourhood—namely, Reinecke's Improvisata in F (Op. 94) and Max Bruch's Fantasia in D minor (Op. 11), both works for two pianos. These items were admirably played, and the difficulties which they presented were overcome with facility and gracefulness. Reinecke's brilliant composition especially was followed with interest. The only piano solo, that played by Mr. Misdale, was Rubinstein's Solo Sonata (Op. 12). Mr. Misdale did ample justice to the composition, but it did not occupy a high place in the estimation of the audience generally. Beethoven's Sonata in A (Op. 69), for piano and violoncello, proved a genial selection, and both in the work which he had to do in the rendering of this composition, and in Golttermann's Adagio and Finale in A minor, Herr Giessing showed very fine executive qualities, and may be regarded as an acquisition to Yorkshire.

Under the direction of Dr. Spark, a Special Monthly Concert was given at the Leeds Town Hall, on the 6th ult. In addition to several Organ Solos, ably played by the borough organist—among which may be mentioned an Air with variations in G major, by Haydn—songs were given by Miss Annie Albu, Miss Kennedy, and Mr. Simeon Northrop. Miss Albu has gained great popularity in Yorkshire, and her clear and cultured style of singing met with much acceptance on this occasion. Her best effort was in the rendering of "Hear ye, Israel." Miss Kennedy and Mr. Northrop shared in the general appreciation which was bestowed on the performances.

The Saturday Evening Concerts at the Leeds Coliseum, given under the direction of Mr. G. W. Lane, have continued to gain in popularity, large audiences being the rule. The character of the entertainment, as well as the artists who take part, are subject to agreeable variation. At the Concert given on the 6th ult. Mr. Charles Blagbro' (tenor) was singled out for special honours, and Mr. Fred. Gordon (bass) had a hearty reception. Miss Conway (soprano), Miss Ada Battey (contralto), the Huddersfield Arion Quartet, and the Band of the First Gloucestershire Regiment also contributed to the performance. Mr. H. Harrison accompanied the songs.

Mr. Edgar Haddock's Musical Evenings, at the Leeds Philosophical Hall, have progressed with great satisfaction both to audiences and, it is to be hoped, to those who have contributed to their artistic success. Mr. Haddock's scheme has gained appreciative attention, and his audiences are very numerous. On the 5th ult., the solo pianist was Mr. Alfred Broughton, who rendered Beethoven's Sonata in E flat (Op. 27, No. 1), and compositions by Rubinstein and Chopin. The Beethoven Sonata enabled the pianist to display his fine executive powers, and the work had apparently been well studied. Mr. Haddock, at the same Concert, gave the well-known Recitative and Adagio from Spohr's Concerto in G minor. Mr. S. Liddle was an able accompanist.

The Bradford Subscription Concert season was brought to a close on the 5th ult., when St. George's Hall was again filled in every part. Foremost in point of individual achievement was, of course, the playing of Professor Joachim, whose surpassing intellectual power and finished method were worthily bestowed on Beethoven's Concerto in D, Spohr's Adagio from the Eleventh Concerto, and two Moreaux, by Schumann (adaptations by Ernest Rudorff). The Unfinished Symphony in B minor, of Schubert, afforded excellent material for the employment of the delicacies and refinements of Mr. Hallé's band. Much interest was centred in the ingeniously woven music of the Overture to "Hamlet" (Gade), and the delicate imagery and exquisite rhythms of Rubinstein's ballet music from "Feramors" were brought out with striking effect. Characteristic precision and finish were brought to bear on Glinka's "Komarinskaja" Scherzo, and the ever-varying transitions of design and colour which it presents proved a source of new delight amid a wealth of orchestral music, such as is seldom to be found within the limits of one Concert. Mr. Winch was the vocalist. The season may be regarded as one of the most successful which the Subscription Concerts Committee has had.

The concluding Concert of Mr. Rawlinson Ford's season was given in the Leeds Coliseum, on the 17th ult. There was a decided improvement in the attendance. The Concert was fully as interesting as any of its predecessors, and the high tone of excellence which was sounded at the beginning was preserved to the end. The Brahms Quintet in F minor was rendered by Herr Joachim, Miss Emily Shinner, Messrs. Gibson, Ould, and Bache. The performance of this abstruse and vigorous composition was of a masterly kind. The Mendelssohn Quartet in E minor, in which the four first-named artists took part, afforded a remarkably strong contrast, and, of course, was much more widely appreciated than the work of Brahms, which demands not only intelligent, but musical, perception. The Quartet was rendered brilliantly. Herr Joachim repeated the Schumann solos which he gave at the last Bradford Subscription Concert, and won fresh commendation for his consummate playing. He took part with his pupil, Miss Shinner, in a duet from Spohr—a performance which proved extremely agreeable, and brought a vast deal of credit to Miss Shinner. Mr. Bache's solo was, as a matter of course, one of Liszt's compositions—the "Benediction de Dieu dans la Solitude," the performance of which was a great executive feat, and one of the finest features of the Concert. Mr. Ould contributed a cello solo, Cantilena, by Goltermann, and an arrangement of one of Schubert's "Moments Musicaux." Mrs. Hutchinson was the vocalist, and sang with much success. An extra Concert is to be given, under Mr. Ford's auspices, during April, at which Herr Richter and his band, in conjunction with the Leeds Philharmonic Society, will give a performance of Beethoven's Choral Symphony. Mr. Alfred Broughton, who officiated as accompanist on the occasion of the last Popular Concert, is the Conductor of the Philharmonic Society.

MUSIC IN EDINBURGH.

DURING the last few weeks Concerts have been more numerous than usual at this season, and remarkable both as to quality and quantity compared with those of ten or twelve years ago.

On February 22 an Evening Concert was given in Queen Street Hall. The somewhat lengthy programme contained Beethoven's Trio in C minor, a Sonata of Schubert for violin and piano, a selection of Scottish Airs arranged as duets by Otto Schweizer, and numerous songs. The performers were Mr. Carl Hamilton (violin), Mr. Franklin Peterson (piano), Miss Annie Grey and Messrs. A. Edmunds and J. H. d'Egville (vocalists).

On February 27 Señor Sarasate gave a Recital in the Music Hall. The pièce de résistance was the Fantasia in C (Op. 159) by Schubert, the enormous difficulties of which are so well known that violinists of high standing have hitherto excluded it from their programmes. The very difficult pianoforte accompaniment was admirably played by Mr. Cusins. A Concertstück by Saint-Saëns, "Zigeuner-Weisen," a Bolero by Sarasate, and Album-Blatt (Wagner—Wilhelm) were the remaining solos of the violinist, and Mr. Cusins contributed Chopin's Andante Spianato, a Polonaise in E flat, and "Tannhäuser" March (Wagner—Liszt) as pianoforte solos. This Concert was, most deservedly, a great success. A second Concert will be given by Señor Sarasate on the 27th inst.

On the 3rd ult. Mdle. Schow-Rosing gave a Concert in the Masonic Hall, assisted by Mr. Della Torre (piano) and Herr Gallrein; and on the 6th ult. Mr. Waddell's choir gave us a second opportunity of hearing Dvorák's "Spectre's Bride." This work makes unusual demands on amateurs, but the members of the choir acquitted themselves creditably. The accompaniments were played by a small string band, led by Mr. Daly, with Mr. T. Craig at the piano.

On the 10th ult. the Philosophical Institution gave the annual Concert in the Music Hall. The artists, as usual, were Miss Agnes Zimmermann, Signor Piatti, and Herr Joachim. Although the programme contained little that was new to the audience, the excellence of the performance made it most enjoyable. Mendelssohn's C minor Trio opened the Concert; Miss Zimmermann contributed three Sketches by Sterndale Bennett; Signor Piatti (whom we were pleased to see restored to health) gave Veracini's Largo and Allegro, and Chopin's Introduction and Polonaise, and Herr Joachim Bach's Sarabande and Bourrée and some Hungarian dances. Mr. Herbert Thorndike, as vocalist, made a favourable impression in songs by Gounod, Schumann, and Maude V. White.

On the afternoon of the 13th ult. Mr. Frederic Lamond, pupil of Bülow and Liszt, astonished his audience in the Music Hall by a display of genius and knowledge remarkable in one so young. A very exacting programme, played entirely from memory, justified the reports of his successes in Vienna and Berlin, the rendering of Beethoven's Sonata (Op. 111) deserving, perhaps, most praise, not only for the superb technique, but for the breadth and grasp of ideas displayed. The twenty-eight variations on a theme of Paganini's (Op. 35), by Brahms, were admirably played, and a composition of his own, a Romance, showed great promise.

M. de Pachmann revisited Edinburgh on the 20th ult., and displayed to a fairly numerous audience in the Music Hall his vivacious and captivating style of playing. Beethoven's Sonata (Op. 31, No. 2) in D minor, and compositions by Schumann, Weber, Raff, Henselt, and Chopin constituted the programme. The Andante Spianato and Polonaise of the last-named composer were played in a manner never equalled by any pianist who has visited Edinburgh. It is only fair to say that it is due to the energy of Messrs. Paterson and Sons that we of this city have of late had the opportunity of hearing the performance of so many talented artists. M. de Pachmann announces a second visit for the 3rd inst.

On the evening of the 22nd ult. the Edinburgh University Musical Society's Concert, under the direction of Professor Sir Herbert Oakeley, took place in the Music Hall. An orchestra of local performers, assisted by a few professionals from other cities, and a choir of about a hundred students, gave orchestral and vocal selections. The vocal portions consisted of choruses, arranged for male voices, among which were Haydn's "Humorous Serenade," Verdi's "Chorus of Crusaders," "Shall I tell you whom I love," part-song by Sir Herbert Oakeley, "Duncan Gray," and others, whilst the items for the orchestra were Overtures—Handel's "Occasional," Rossini's "La Gazza Ladra," and Auber's "Masaniello."

MUSIC IN GLASGOW AND WEST OF SCOTLAND.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

THE leading event of last month may justly be said to have been the début of Mr. Frederic Lamond, the young pianist, in his native city, which took place in the Queen's Rooms on the 8th ult., in presence of an overflowing and enthusiastic audience. Mr. Lamond is only seventeen, and very early gave evidence of great musical talent. Before the age of nine he had run through much of the music of the great masters for the pianoforte, which was within the compass of his little hands, and when yet only in his tenth year he was appointed organist of Laurieston Parish Church, so rapid being his progress that within another year he could play the principal works of Bach, Handel, and Mendelssohn for that instrument. He practised also the violin and the oboe, manifesting generally a decided leaning towards orchestral music. He has been studying abroad for the last three or four years, under Bülow and Liszt, as perhaps readers of THE MUSICAL TIMES already know, and has made remarkably successful appearances as a solo pianist in Berlin, Vienna, and other important musical centres. The programme of his first Concert in Glasgow was of the most exacting character. It embraced Beethoven's Sonata in C minor (Op. 111), the twenty-eight Variations on a theme of Paganini (Op. 35) by Brahms, several works of Chopin, the Etudes Symphoniques of Schumann, and other important pianoforte compositions, including a highly promising Romance of his own. All was played, with note-accuracy, entirely from memory. London musical people will have had an opportunity ere this number of THE MUSICAL TIMES is issued of judging for themselves of the ability of Mr. Lamond; but I deem it no exaggeration, through perhaps partial, to say that he must take rank even now with the very foremost of pianoforte virtuosos. His technique is simply marvellous, and if his touch is a little hard, and his cantabile wanting in softness, or at least not legitimately produced, these and such other shortcomings as may have been felt most perhaps in his expositions of Chopin, must soon be overcome. Mr. Lamond gave a second Concert in St. Andrew's Hall, on the 19th ult., when there was a very large audience, there being certainly no fewer than three thousand persons present, of all classes of society.

The second Open Rehearsal of the Glasgow Amateur Orchestral Society took place on the 10th ult., in the Waterloo Rooms. The membership, which includes five or six ladies, is about fifty (every instrument being represented), and the performances on this occasion were very praiseworthy, considering that no professional assistance whatever was employed. Beethoven's Overture "Prometheus," Gade's Overture "Nachklang von Ossian," a Suite in D minor by Lachner, a Minuet and Trio (Op. 14), by Prout, and the Overture to Gounod's "Mirella," were the principal orchestral selections. Mr. W. T. Hoeck conducted.

The Choir of London Road United Presbyterian Church gave a Concert of sacred and secular music in the Church, on the 11th ult. Attwood's solo and quartet "Turn Thy face from my sins" and two numbers from Spohr's "Last Judgment" were among the sacred selections, with Smart's "Good-night, thou glorious sun," Leslie's "Troubadour," and other part-songs in the secular part. Mr. A. M. Macdougall conducted and Mr. W. Kyle accompanied.

In Hillhead Established Church there is a Ladies' Choir in connection with the Sunday afternoon children's service. The Choir, which numbers about forty, gave a Concert of Music for female voices, on the 15th ult., in the Burgh Hall, Hillhead, the room being completely filled with the fashion of the neighbourhood. Lahee's Cantata "The Sleeping Beauty" was the principal item in the programme, which also included the "Chorus of Houris," from Schumann's "Paradise and the Peri"; Smart's "Song of the Water Lilies," and a setting of Psalm 67 for treble and alto voices by W. Hume, written for the Glasgow Academy Choir. The singing of the Choir was marked by educated taste and refinement. Mr. Richmond, who acts as honorary trainer of the choir, conducted, and Mr. Clapper-ton, organist of Sandyford Church, and Mr. McCulley, organist of Hillhead Church, gave their services as accompanists.

The Kyrle Choir, or "Musical Branch" of the Kyrle Society, gave several Concerts during the month, chiefly performances of J. F. Barnett's Cantata "The Building of the Ship," and at low rates of admission, in pursuance, on its part, of the praiseworthy objects of the Society. The choir is this season being trained and conducted by Mr. C. Hall Woolnoth. It consists of about eighty voices, with a high average of musical education.

M. Vladimir de Pachmann gave a Pianoforte Recital, on 22nd ult., in the Queen's Rooms; selections from Chopin, Henselt, and Moscheles were conspicuous in the programme. Beethoven's Sonata (Op. 32, No. 2) was also included.

Mozart's First Mass in C was sung, on the 24th ult., by the Musical Association connected with John Street United Presbyterian Church, Mr. George Taggart conducting. Selections from "Judas Maccabæus" were also performed.

A performance of Handel's Oratorio "Samson" was given by the Vale of Leven Choral Society in Alexandria, Dumbartonshire, on the 5th ult., under the direction of Mr. J. Love. The choral singing was distinguished by vigour rather than by refinement; but, generally speaking, the performance, which was given with full orchestral accompaniment, did credit to the Society's industry and enterprise.

On the 9th ult., the same Oratorio was produced by the Johnstone Tonic Sol-fa Association, with a fairly good quartet of solo vocalists, and orchestral aid. Mr. Robert Greenlees conducted.

A performance of Handel's "Messiah" was given by the Kilmacool Musical Association, on the 19th ult., in the United Presbyterian Church of that place. Competent vocalists took the solo parts, and there was a small orchestra, aided by pianoforte and harmonium. The choruses were rendered with commendable care, and with considerable effect. Mr. W. Paterson Cross conducted.

MUSIC IN AMERICA.

New York, March 10, 1886.

THE second season of the German Opera at the Metropolitan Opera house came to a close on the 6th inst. with a performance of Goldmark's "Queen of Sheba," the opera that has been the most pronounced popular success of the season. It had been performed fourteen times previously, but the last audience was the most numerous of the fifty-two that had gathered in the theatre since the house was opened on November 23, 1885. The season consisted of thirty-nine evening performances, on Mondays, Wednesdays, and Fridays; and thirteen Saturday afternoon Matinées. Nine operas were given, in the following order:—"Lohengrin," "Carmen," "The Prophet," "Die Walküre," "The Queen of Sheba," "Tannhäuser," "Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg," "Faust," and "Rienzi." The last of the new productions, "Rienzi," was discussed in last month's review, and it remains only to comment briefly on the attitude exhibited by the public toward the season as a whole, and toward the various operas. From a purely musical point of view, it was disappointing that Goldmark's opera met with such an enthusiastic reception, since this fact acted as a check to the enterprising spirit manifested by the Director in the early portion of the season, and resulted in the curtailment of the repertory promised in the prospectus of Wagner's "Die Götterdämmerung," Verdi's "Aida," Halévy's "La Juive," and Ponchielli's "Gioconda." These operas, with the exception of "Die Götterdämmerung," could have been given without material extra cost to the administration for scenery and costumes, but Mr. E. C. Stanton (who directs the Opera on behalf of the stockholders of the Metropolitan Company) argued, wisely perhaps, that neither of them was likely to increase the attendance, and that so long as the dress of "The Queen of Sheba" had cost more than that of any other opera, the lady might safely be permitted to earn as much as possible. So the opera was performed fifteen times and maintained its popularity so well that it is estimated that it brought 60,000 dollars into the exchequer of the company, and was witnessed by no less than 44,000 persons. The opera had no rival in popularity except "Die Meistersinger," which was given the same number of times as "The Queen of Sheba." The average attendance, exclusive of the two hundred or more nightly occupants of the stockholders' boxes, on the eight performances of Wagner's only comic opera was 2,500 persons. After these two leading works the operas ranked as follows in public estimation, as indicated by the receipts from ticket sales at the box-office:—3, "Tannhäuser," with four performances, average attendance, 2,500; 4, "Rienzi," seven, 2,428; 5, "Lohengrin," four, 2,375; 6, "The Prophet," three, 2,366; 7, "Die Walküre," four, 2,170; 8, "Faust," five, 2,000; 9, "Carmen," two, 2,000.

Concerning the financial outcome of the season, we are as yet thrown on conjecture. It is within reason to say, however, that the receipts from box office sales alone were between 175,000 and 200,000 dollars, and that total sum was swelled to, say, 300,000 dollars by the assessments on the box-holders ordered a month before the opening of the season. That all of this sum and between 10,000 and 30,000 dollars more was swallowed up by the season's expenses is an indication of the large scale on which the operas were presented. In making this estimate, however, the fact should be taken into consideration that at least 30,000 dollars was expended on the single item of interest on capital borrowed to build the Opera House. Unquestionably, if the building were unincumbered, German Opera, in spite of the sumptuousness of its presentation this season, would have been a profitable investment. The result has been exceedingly gratifying to the stockholders, and they have shown their confidence in the stability of the present taste in operatic entertainments by resolving to give German Opera for at least three years more. To this end Herr Seidl, who has made himself a great favourite with the public, has been re-engaged for next season, as well as Fräulein Lehmann, Fräulein Brandt, Herr Fischer (bass, formerly of the Dresden Opera), Herr Robinson (baritone), and Herr Alvary (second tenor). The promises for next season are brighter by far than they were for this. Director Stanton will go to Europe in April to engage artists as well as to negotiate with Herr Goldmark for his new opera "Merlin," to purchase which he has the option until July 1. It is by no means certain, however, that the opera will be in next season's list. That will depend very much on its quality. The close race which "Die Meistersinger" ran with "The Queen of Sheba," during the season just ended, has furnished a convincing argument that the public have not given their affection to mere spectacle, as the advocates of Italian Opera would have us believe. Besides, although the extreme wing of the Wagnerite party does not wish to admit it, Goldmark's opera is considerably more than a mere spectacle. It is Director Stanton's expressed purpose to consider the musical and dramatic qualities of all novelties first and their spectacular possibilities next. There is no question that Wagner's works have finally secured the domination over the American operatic stage, and that their influence thus far has been beneficial in every respect. But the Metropolitan administration will not permit the Wagner enthusiasm to carry him off his feet. At present Mr. Stanton is working as a brake on the Wagner wheel which Herr Seidl is, of course, desirous of whirling with all his might. Herr Seidl thinks that the entire Nibelungen tetralogy besides "Tristan and Isolde," with a possible "cycle" of all the Wagner dramas from "Rienzi" to "Parsifal," should be given next season; Mr. Stanton thinks "Die Götterdämmerung" and "Tristan and Isolde" a sufficient addition to the present list, which now wants only the two works "Siegfried" and "The Flying Dutchman" to comprise all of Wagner's dramatic creations. It is significant, of course, that in spite of the fifteen performances of "The Queen of Sheba" more than one-half of the season's representations were devoted to Wagner's operas.

The American Opera Company began its tenth week on March 1, with a representation of Leo Delibes's "Lakmé." Since then the opera has been repeated several times, and will doubtless score as much of a success as any work of the American list. The one feature of the representation which merits success is the scenic, which is certainly remarkable. The next new production will be "The Flying Dutchman," in which Mr. Ludwig, formerly with Carl Rosa's English company, will make his American debut. After that we are to have Delibes's ballet "Sylvia," and Massé's one-act opera "Les Noces de Jeannette," as an evening's entertainment, and finally Rubinstein's "Nero" as the last operatic novelty of a year that has been prodigiously fruitful in novelties.

Our concert-rooms during the last month have afforded few opportunities to hear new works. The one really significant occurrence in this department was the performance of "Parsifal" as an Oratorio by the Oratorio Society, under the direction of Mr. Walter Damrosch, on March 1. The solo parts were chiefly in the hands of members of the German Opera Company, who sang in German, while the chorus and the representatives of the Flower Maidens sang in English. The performance was meritorious only in a comparative sense, and the consensus of public expression concerning the experiment was that it was a mistake, both from a Wagnerian and an anti-Wagnerian point of view, to divorce the text and music of the work from the scenery and action which accompany them.

The third and last of Mr. Gustav Ernest's excellent Chamber Concerts took place on February 25, at Prince's Hall. Again, as on the previous occasions, the classical element was predominant; among the most notable features being a very refined and characteristic performance by the Concert-giver of Chopin's Berceuse and Scherzo in B flat minor, and an excellent rendering of Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto on the part of M. Tivadar Nachéz, whose expressive playing in the Andante movement, more especially, elicited enthusiastic applause. Nor should we omit to mention M. Jules de Swert's admirable performance of violoncello solos by Chopin and Ernest, as well as of a Serenade Espagnole of his own composition. The three artists just named were associated with Mr. J. Komfield in the execution of Kiel's Quartet in A minor (Op. 43), a remarkable, albeit somewhat sombre coloured work, which certainly deserves to be more frequently heard. Mlle. Antoinette Trebelli and Mr. Hirwen Jones were the vocalists.

MR. WALTER WESCHÉ gave a successful Evening Concert, at the Blüthner Rooms, Kensington Gardens Square, on the 23rd ult., assisted by Madame Fassett, Messrs. W. Wiener, B. Albert, and Munkittrick. Among the principal items of the programme may be mentioned a Pianoforte Trio in E flat by the Concert-giver, in which the latter was associated with Messrs. Wiener and Albert, and which was deservedly well received by the audience. The work in question was produced in November last at one of the Musical Artists' Society's performances, and certainly gains in interest upon repetition; a merit which cannot be said to attach to the majority of similar productions in the sphere of absolute music born of the present day. Mr. Wesché's Trio contains a number of pleasing and characteristic themes, which, however, are far too loosely woven to represent, in the result, the symmetrical texture required for the art-form it seeks to realise; the pianoforte part, moreover, too frequently forming merely a more or less elaborate accompaniment to the strings. The attempt to interconnect the first and last movements by the recurrence in the latter of the leading motive of the former, though somewhat abrupt in effect, imparts, on the other hand, an element of coherence to the whole, and is an interesting feature. Of the four orthodox movements of which the Trio consists, the Scherzo (with Trio) appears to us the most noteworthy, being both sprightly and graceful, as Scherzos should be. Vocal and instrumental solos, ably rendered by the artists above mentioned, were also included in the evening's proceedings, which terminated with the performance of a Pianoforte Concerto by Mr. Wesché, played by the composer, a pianoforte arrangement for the orchestral portions of the score being performed on a second instrument by Mr. George Sumpter. The Concert was well attended.

At the fortieth performance of the Musical Artists' Society, held at Willis's Rooms, on the 20th ult., the proceedings included the first production of a Quartet for stringed instruments, for which the prize of twenty-five guineas (offered by a lady member of the Society) had been awarded from among seven competing works of a similar description. Upon an occasion of this kind the judges (in the present case Messrs. Aguilar, H. C. Banister, and Charles E. Stephens) may be said in a measure to be placed upon their trial in their turn, although the presumable unacquaintance of the auditors with the rejected compositions constitutes a prima facie element in the judges' favour, even if the object of their choice should not meet with the approval of a wider circle. Mr. Algernon Ashton, the successful competitor in this instance, has no reason for complaint in the latter direction, while the above syndicate of gentlemen have, at any rate, bestowed their favour upon a work which, if not remarkable for originality, is a thoroughly musician-like production and worthy of being accorded a repeated hearing, when we may have an opportunity of again referring to it more in detail. Mr. Ashton's Quartet in B flat, as already indicated, was very well received, the composer being called upon the platform to bow his acknowledgments. The Concert was an interesting one in other respects, consisting, as usual, of vocal and instrumental numbers, including amongst the latter a very clever and genial Pianoforte Trio, by Lady Thompson, ably rendered by Miss Fanny Davies, Messrs. Wiener, and B. Albert.

MR. H. STANLEY CRANE gave his first Annual Concert at Brixton Hall on the 1st ult., assisted by Madame Worrell, Miss Kate Flinn, Miss Edith Birkbeck, Mr. Iver McKay, and Mr. George Kentfield, vocalists. Miss May Ostlere contributed two pianoforte solos which were received with great favour. Mr. Henry Leipold gave two pianoforte solos, and also exhibited a thorough acquaintance with the organ in a Fantasia, and a Duet for organ and violin, on which latter instrument Mr. George Leipold played admirably. The Conductors were Mr. J. H. Leipold, Herr Franz Greenings, and Mr. H. Stanley Crane.

We understand that the Archbishop of Canterbury has announced his intention of conferring the degree of Doctor of Music on Mr. C. Warwick Jordan, Mus. Bac., Oxon., who has been for twenty years organist of St. Stephen's, Lewisham, and is the hon. organist of the London Gregorian Choral Association.

ON the 16th ult., Mr. Walter Macfarren gave a lecture at the Bristol Museum, Queen's Road, on "Pianoforte Music, Ancient and Modern." The drift of his lecture was to show that the advance in pianoforte writing had kept pace with the development of the instrument, and that as the pianoforte had approached more nearly to that perfection which was attained in our days, so the music written for the instrument had ever widened its field, until it had become, if not more intrinsically perfect, at least more thoroughly suited to the genius of the instrument. In illustration of his remarks upon the characteristics of the composers for the pianoforte, Mr. Macfarren performed "The Harmonious Blacksmith" (Handel), the Preludes in B flat minor and major (Bach), Variations in F minor (Haydn), a Study in F, from the "Gradius ad Parnassum" (Clementi), a Rondo in A minor (Mozart), the "Moonlight" Sonata (Beethoven), Studies in D and G (Cramer), the "Rondo Brillante" in E flat (Weber), Study in E minor (Moscheles), "Moments Musicaux," Op. 94 (Schubert), two numbers from the "Lieder ohne Worte" (Mendelssohn), a Nocturne in F sharp, Valse in C sharp minor, and Impromptu in G flat (Chopin), the "Lake" and the "Fountain" (Sterndale Bennett), and two of the lecturer's own compositions, "Album Leaf" and Fourth Tarantella. The whole of these works were finely played from memory, and thoroughly appreciated by an attentive and discriminating audience.

THE last but one of Herr Bonawitz's Historical Pianoforte Recitals was given at the Beethoven Rooms, Harley Street, on the 18th ult., when the now accustomed representative programme, illustrative of the progress of pianoforte music, was again gone through with unflinching spirit and unailing executive skill. The numbers, seventeen in all, included specimens by the earlier masters—i.e., Byrde, Froberg, Rameau, and Handel—which were played, as on previous occasions, on a Shudi harpsichord, lent by Messrs. Broadwood. We have before remarked that the additional quaintness thus imparted to the venerable compositions in question is not necessarily historically accurate. Herr Bonawitz, moreover, appears to us somewhat too hurried in their rendering, as if glad to dismiss this (to some of his hearers, no doubt, the most interesting) portion of his programme; while his treatment of the obsolete instrument referred to is scarcely altogether adapted to its idiosyncracies, as displayed with such conspicuous success by Mr. Hipkins, in his interesting lecture on clavier instruments delivered during the late International Exhibition at Kensington. It is needless to add, in view of our previous notices of Herr Bonawitz's Historical Recitals, that the above observations are in no way intended to depreciate the truly artistic tendency and general instructive value of his efforts.

AN excellent Concert was given by Miss Emma Buer, at Brixton Hall, on Tuesday evening, the 23rd ult., before a crowded audience. Miss Mary Davies gave a charming rendering of Rubinstein's "Thou'rt like unto a flower," and Cecile Hartog's "The year's at the spring." Madame Antoinette Stirling met with her accustomed reception for each of her songs. The duet, "Dear love of mine," from A. G. Thomas's "Nadesha," was sung by Miss Davies and Mr. Henry Guy, meeting with a well-merited encore. Mr. Donnell Balfe was also successful in his selections. Mendelssohn's Pianoforte Concerto in G minor was played by Miss Buer, accompanied on strings by Messrs. Easton, Val Marriott, Richardson, Hambleton, and B. Carodus. Both in this important work, and in Wollenhaupt's "Scherzo Brillante," the bénéficiaire displayed considerable technical skill, and worthily earned the manifestations of approval which her performance elicited. A violoncello solo was commendably executed by Mr. Hambleton; and Mr. W. A. Easton (violin), and Mr. Turle Lee, the accompanist, were associated in the first movement of Beethoven's Sonata (Op. 24).

WE have pleasure in drawing attention to "The Composers' Vade Mecum," by V. C. Mahillon, published by the author, which gives a table showing the range, capabilities, and characteristics of every instrument used in orchestral, military, and brass bands (with the fingering of all brass instruments), and will prove extremely useful for pupils studying instrumentation. It is very legibly printed both upon paper, and on linen.

THE Fifth Annual Ladies' Concert of the Civil Service Vocal Union was given in the Great Hall, Cannon Street Hotel, on Monday evening, the 8th ult., before a crowded audience. Under the efficient conductorship of Mr. J. H. Maunder, a selection of part-music was rendered with considerable precision by the choir, which numbered about fifty male voices. Amongst other items, the programme included a highly commendable interpretation of Schubert's "Gondolier's Serenade," Mendelssohn's "To the Sons of Art," and Mr. Maunder's tuneful part-song "Ocean Charms," the latter being deservedly encored. "Russian Dances" by Wieniawski and "Spanish Dances" by Sarasate were excellently played on the violin by Mr. Victor Buziau, and songs were sung with success by Mr. Sidney Tower, Mr. Arthur F. D'Oyly, Mr. Sealy Williams, and Mr. G. Micklewood. Messrs. I. J. Leach and J. P. Harding were the accompanists. The management of the Concert reflected every credit upon the indefatigable hon. secretary, Mr. J. E. Chapman.

THE annual Concert of the Violin Classes of the Birkbeck Institution, under the direction of Mr. Fitzhenry, took place on the 6th ult. The members of the classes were heard to advantage in "Pregiera" (Hauser), March (Handel), "Sérénade des Mandolines" (Desormes), and "Danse Moresque" (Muscat), and Mr. T. E. Gatehouse was very successful in his solos, "Air Varié" (De Beriot) and "Faust" (Alard), receiving an enthusiastic encore for both pieces. The vocalists were Miss Ethel Murray, Madame Marian McKenzie, Master Frank Peskett, Mr. W. G. Forington, and Mr. Kift, all of whom gave evident satisfaction to the audience in their several solos. Mr. Charles Fry recited Macaulay's "Virginia" with great vigour and point, and greatly amused the audience in two short humorous pieces. Mrs. Fitzhenry and Mr. E. Izard were the accompanists, and also performed the Overture "Guillaume Tell" as a piano duet.

AN interesting Concert was given on Thursday, February 25, at Steinway Hall, by Madame Eugene Oswald and Madame Henrietta Whyte. Madame Whyte has a pleasant contralto voice, which she employed to advantage in two songs, and with Miss Carrie Blackwell in Rossini's "Quis est homo?" Miss Mary Davies in "Die Lotos Blume" and in "The year's at the spring" was received with enthusiasm, as was Mr. Percy Palmer in Marriott's tenor song "Hush." Mr. Ernest Birch sang Gounod's "Nazareth" and Hervey's "Love of my life," and Mrs. Hallam gave Mozart's "Deh vieni" with great delicacy of voice. Madame Oswald played Beethoven's Sonata Pathétique, Chopin's Polonaise in E flat, and in a duet with Miss Winifred Robinson on the violin, and another with Herr Oberthur on the harp.

MISS MAUD CAMERON'S Annual Concert, which took place at the Surrey Masonic Hall, Camberwell, on Monday, the 1st ult., was a decided success. The feature of the evening was Miss Cameron's artistic rendering of the recitative and solo "Where art thou, Father" from Dvorák's "Spectre's Bride," in which, notwithstanding the trying nature of the music, she proved herself thoroughly at home, and gained a rapturous recall. Mr. Venables' choir provided the part-music, and the solo vocal items were contributed by Mesdames Paget, Worrell, Helen Heath, and Featherby-Capel, Messrs. Yates, Reed, Budd, and Thurlay Beale. Mr. William C. Hann gave a couple of violoncello solos, and Mr. John Harrison acted as accompanist, and also played two pianoforte solos.

A SUCCESSFUL Concert was given by Miss Emma Jenkins at the Eyre Arms Assembly Rooms, St. John's Wood, on the 2nd ult., in aid of St. Monica's Home for Sick and Crippled children, Brondesbury Park. The following artists kindly gave their valuable services: Madame Edith Wynne, Madame Isabel Fasset, Miss Adela Vernon, Miss Mary Willis, Mr. Lawrence Kellie, Mr. Roy St. Claire, Herr Emil Mahr, and Mr. Alfred Allen, the latter officiating as accompanist. Miss Emma Jenkins, as solo pianist, played with much success selections from the works of Scarlatti, Liszt, and Chopin.

MR. HERBERT WALTER WAREING, Mus. Bac., of King's College, has recently passed the final examination for the degree of Doctor of Music, at the University of Cambridge.

A CONCERT was given at the City Temple, Holborn, on Thursday, the 18th ult., under the conductorship of Mr. E. Minshall. The proceedings commenced with a competition for bass and baritone vocalists, for a prize of two guineas, the audience to make the award by means of ballot. There were eight competitors, and the prize was gained by Mr. Alec Marsh, a student at the Royal Academy of Music. In the second part Miss Clara Dowle's singing was much admired, her last song being accompanied on the pianoforte by Miss Adela Duckham, a little girl of eleven years old, a student at the Guildhall School of Music; Miss Kate Chaplin also gave three violin solos, all of which were well rendered, and much applauded. Miss Chaplin was accompanied on the pianoforte by Miss Margaret Hoare, R.A.M.

MISS KATHLEEN GRANT gave an excellent Concert, at the Forest Hill Public Baths, on the 18th ult., assisted in the vocal department by Madame Mudie-Bolingbroke, Messrs. E. Lloyd, Alfred Kenningham, and Alfred Medcalf. The concert-giver's songs were most warmly received, especially Macfarren's "Pack clouds away," the effect of which was much aided by Mr. H. Lazarus's finely played clarinet obbligato. It is needless to say that Mr. Lloyd's vocal contributions elicited the most enthusiastic applause. The instrumental soloists were Herr Josef Ludwig (violin), Herr J. Adolphe Brouil (violoncello), Mr. H. Lazarus (clarinet), and Mr. Henry Smith (pianoforte). Mr. John Harrison shared with Mr. T. Barrow Dowling the duties of Conductor.

DURING the past winter six Chamber-music Concerts have been given at Cardiff under the direction of the Senate of the South Wales University College, who consider the encouragement of the taste for classical music a legitimate branch of their educational work. There were five Trio Concerts, at which Herr Peiniger held the post of violinist, and for the sixth Concert a string-quartet was engaged, which was led by Herr Peiniger. The cellists have been Mr. Charles Ould, Mr. Van Gelder, and M. Albert. The series has been well attended, considering that it is the first time Concerts of this kind have been given in Cardiff, and the Senate of the College hope to arrange a similar series for next winter.

THE MEMBERS of the Grosvenor Choral Society gave their 16th Monthly Concert, on Friday evening, the 19th ult., at the Grosvenor Hall, Buckingham Palace Road. The programme, a miscellaneous one, comprised part-songs by Smart, Archer, Leslie, and Earl of Mornington; Lemmens's "Fairy Ring," and Rossini's "Come with flowers" from "William Tell," were performed for the first time by this Society, the latter with marked success. Songs were contributed by Miss Annie Layton, Mrs. T. P. Frame (who also presided at the piano), and Miss Louise Bond, Mr. Hirwen Jones, and Mr. A. Roach. Mr. P. Legrew Harrison gave two pianoforte solos, and Mr. T. F. Williams two concertina solos. Mr. David Woodhouse conducted.

THE NORTH-EAST LONDON CHORAL SOCIETY gave the second Concert of the season, at Morley Hall, Hackney, on February 24. The programme consisted of Handel's Second Concerto, for organ and orchestra; Gounod's "Gallia," Mr. John E. West's new setting of the 130th Psalm, "Out of the deep," and a miscellaneous selection. The principal vocalists were Miss Annie Marriott, Miss Lottie West, Mr. Joseph Tapley, and Mr. Thomas Lawler; leader of the band, Mr. H. Baynton; accompanist, Mr. Louis B. Prout, R.A.M.; Conductor, Mr. John E. West, F.C.O.

A VERY successful Concert was given in the General Meeting-room, Euston Station, on Monday, the 15th ult., under the conductorship of Mr. C. J. Lacock. The solo vocalists were Miss Ethel Winn, Miss Georgina Priddle, Miss Annie Williams, Mr. J. G. Blanchard, and Mr. Egbert Roberts; violin, Mr. Bernhard Carrodus; harp, Mr. Miles. A special feature of the Concert was the excellent singing of the Euston Glee Union, under the direction of Mr. S. Kilbey.

WE are informed that Mr. F. Kilvington Hattersley has been asked to compose an Orchestral Overture for the next Leeds Musical Festival. Mr. Hattersley entered the Royal Academy of Music in January, 1881, obtained the Balfe Scholarship and Charles Lucas Medal for composition, and has produced several works of much importance with signal success.

AN excellent Ballad Concert was given at the Royal Victoria Hall, Waterloo Bridge Road, on the 18th ult., the principal artists being Miss Beata Francis, Madame Evans-Warwick, Miss Luranah Aldridge, Mr. Sims Reeves, Mr. Alfred Rudland, and Mr. Ernest Birch (vocalists); Herr Otto Peiniger (violin); solo pianoforte and accompanist, Mr. A. Pusey-Keith, and reciter, Mr. Frederick Thomas. It need scarcely be said that the songs contributed by Mr. Reeves—who was ably accompanied by Mr. J. Maunder—excited the utmost enthusiasm, and the programme, which was strictly adhered to, gave the most complete satisfaction to a crowded audience.

A SUCCESSFUL Concert was given at Streatham, on Thursday, the 4th ult., in aid of the Building Fund of St. Peter's Church. The instrumentalists were Mdlle. Bertha Brouil and Mons. T. J. A. Brouil (who played violin and cello solos respectively), and Miss Florence Horn and Mrs. Owen Lewis, pianists. The vocalists were Misses Constance and Eva Layton, Miss Dickinson, Mr. Parkes, Mr. Agutter, Master E. Knott, and Mr. W. S. Trollope. Some members of the choir sang a selection of part-songs and glees in finished style. Mr. C. T. Cooke, A.R.A.M., rendered most valuable assistance as accompanist.

ON Tuesday, the 16th ult., a performance was given in the Boys' School, Gloucester Street, of Farmer's Oratorio "Christ and His Soldiers," which was extremely well rendered by the St. George-the-Martyr, Holborn, Temperance Choir, under the able conductorship of Mr. Arthur J. Winter, organist of St. Peter's, Great Windmill Street. Miss Maud Evans presided at the pianoforte and, in the unavoidable absence of Mr. Hammond, the organ was played by Mr. Lewis E. Lewis. The soloists were Miss Madge Christo, Miss Wyatt, Miss Page, Miss Godding; Messrs. J. W. Row, A. Wright, F. Spiers, and H. Knight. A small orchestra lent efficient aid.

ON the evening of the 1st ult. Madame Agnes Raymond gave her first Annual Concert in the Peckham New Hall. Notwithstanding the inclemency of the weather, a very large and enthusiastic audience assembled to listen to one of the best entertainments yet given in this part of South London. Madame Raymond, who received quite an ovation for her rendering of the "Lost Chord," was assisted by Madame Adeline Paget, Miss Cockburn, Messrs. Orlando Harley, Henry Taylor, Franklin Clive, H. Horscroft, and others. The instrumentalists were Mr. McGrath (solo trumpet), Mr. T. E. Gatehouse (solo violin), with Messrs. Sidney Hill and Herbert Brown at the piano.

AT a recent Concert given at St. Barnabas' School, Clapham, the pupils of Mrs. Beesley were assisted by her brother, the Rev. T. H. Spinney, M.A., Oxon., F.C.O., and Rector of Newborough, Derby. Mrs. Beesley is to be congratulated upon the successful result of her teaching, as exemplified by the pianoforte playing of Misses F. Brown, Cocks, Dörmer, Groves (two), Lush (two), F. Wyld; Messrs. Butler, H. Beesley, and H. Wyld, and the singing of Miss Armfield, Miss Cohen, Miss Edith Wyld, and Mrs. T. H. Spinney, all of whom were warmly applauded. Several pieces were also most artistically rendered by Mrs. Beesley and the Rev. T. H. Spinney.

HAYDN'S "Creation" was performed by the Sacred Harmonic Society, on the 12th ult., at St. James's Hall, on which occasion this familiar work was excellently rendered, under the conductorship of Mr. W. H. Cummings. Miss Griswold was to have taken the soprano airs, but, being unable to appear, an excellent substitute was found in Miss Annie Marriott, who sang the music unexceptionably. Mr. Harper Kearton needed more animation, but Mr. Watkin Mills was admirable in the bass music, which displayed his rich voice to great advantage.

MISS SASSE, a Professor of the pianoforte at the Guildhall School of Music, gave a highly successful Concert at the ladies' division of King's College, Kensington Square, on February 27. The instrumental performers were Miss Emily Shinner (violin), Mr. Donkin (viola), Miss Hemmings (cello), and Miss Sasse (pianoforte); vocalists, Miss Eugénie Kemble, Miss Henden-Warde, and Mr. Henry Phillips. Miss Sasse's artistic playing was much admired. Mr. R. B. Addison acted as Conductor.

THE 20th Consecutive Monthly Concert of the St. George's Glee Union, given on the 5th ult., at the Pimlico Rooms, Warwick Street, was a decided success. Mr. J. Henry Leipold and Mr. George Leipold elicited rapturous applause for their masterly performances on the pianoforte and violin respectively. The other artists were Miss Mary Mackway, Miss Annie Wilson, Mr. Hirwen Jones, Mr. A. Maple, and Mr. W. H. Webb. The part-songs were all extremely well rendered under Mr. Joseph Monday's direction. Mr. J. H. Leipold presided at the pianoforte.

ON Tuesday, the 9th ult., the combined forces of the Kennington Orchestral Club, and the St. James's (Kennington) Choral Society, gave a Concert at the Horns Assembly Room, Kennington, which was well filled. The vocalists were Miss Agnes Richardson, Madame Annie Cockburn, and Mr. Alex. Tucker, all of whom were well received. Miss Annie Shelton accompanied, and Mr. W. H. Tozer played Mozart's Concerto (No. 2) in A major. The part-singing of the Choral Society was exceedingly good. Mr. Orbel Hinchliff conducted.

THE Weekly Organ Recital was given at the Bow and Bromley Institute, on Saturday evening, the 20th ult., by Mr. F. G. Ogbourne, when a most attractive programme was performed before a large audience. Mr. Ogbourne played with his usual taste and skill; the music was admirably rendered and met with well merited applause. Miss Eleanor Rees contributed several songs with much effect. Mr. J. Boatwright performed with much success two violoncello solos, and Mr. F. Meen was an able accompanist.

THE Kyrie Choir, under the direction of Mr. F. A. W. Docker, gave a performance of "St. Paul," on the 17th ult., in All Saints' Church, Haggerstone, the soloists being Miss Clara Hoschke, Miss Isabel Tomalin, Mr. Henry Cooper, and Mr. Jabez West; and, on the 24th ult., a performance of "Judas Maccabeus" in St. Augustin's Church, Bermondsey, when the soloists were Miss Clara Hoschke, Miss Adelaide Clarke, Mr. Edwin Bryant, and Mr. James Blackney.

THE usual Monthly Concert of the English College of Music, Regent Street, took place at the Institution on the 4th ult. Works by Beethoven, Mozart, Chopin, Rode, Schumann, and Hummel were performed by the students, in some instances assisted by their professors. The "Divertimento" Trio (Mozart), for violin, viola, and cello, and the Trio in E flat (Beethoven), for piano, violin, and cello were highly successful, and gave satisfactory proof of the continued progress of the College.

MR. G. F. GEAUSSENT, Principal of the Hampstead Conservatoire of Music, announces the first of a series of Students' Concerts in connection with the School, to be given at the Prince's Hall, on Saturday afternoon, the 3rd inst., when three of the Professors of the Conservatoire, Mr. R. E. Miles, Mr. A. J. Greenish, and Mr. Charles Fry will assist. Hofmann's "Song of the Norns" will be an interesting feature in the programme.

A CONCERT was given at West Kensington Hall, on the 23rd ult., by the teachers of the Chelsea District. The vocalists were Miss Kate Cove, Miss Rogers, Miss Dean, Miss Peck, Miss Appleby, Miss Eyles, Miss Blade, Mr. G. Collar, Mr. Wynn, Mr. Stokes, and Mr. H. Collar. The choir, conducted by Mr. Wynn, performed an excellent selection of part-music, and Mr. Ricks and Mr. Mark Wilks interested the audience with their readings.

A SELECTION of music was given to the patients of Brompton Hospital on the 2nd ult., by the following artists: Miss Beata Francis, Miss Damian, Mr. Le Breton, Mr. Ernest Birch, Signor Villa (vocalists), Mdlle. G. Pacini (pianoforte), and Mrs. Fairfax (Reciter). Miss Josephine Agabeg was the accompanist. There were numerous encores. The Concert was under the direction of Mr. Wilhelm Ganz.

THE East Finchley Choral Society gave a performance of Wilfred Bendall's "Parizadeh" at the Lecture Hall, East Finchley, on Monday, the 1st ult. The solo parts were sustained by Madame George, Miss Muriel Rayson, and Mr. Robert George. The Cantata was well rendered and thoroughly appreciated. Mr. Jeayes conducted, and Miss Janes was the accompanist.

A VERY successful Concert was given by the members of the All Saints' (Lambeth) Choral Society, on the 9th ult., in All Saints' Schoolroom. The programme comprised standard glees, songs, duets, &c., which were contributed by Misses E. Brewer, Latta, and Meaton, Messrs. Fred. Goddard and A. Robinson. Pianoforte solos and duets were played by the Misses M. and E. Brewer. Mr. Arthur Robinson conducted.

THE Second Concert of the Stormont Road Choral Society, under the conductorship of Mr. Frank Idle, took place at Lavender Hill on the 8th ult. The first part of the programme consisted of Van Bree's Cantata, "St. Cecilia's Day," and the second part was miscellaneous, including, among other items, Schumann's "Gipsy Life." Miss Fanny Atkinson, Mr. S. Kessell, and Mr. W. Ebbs were the soloists.

WE have much pleasure in announcing that Mr. Barnby has accepted the appointment of Conductor at the Royal Academy of Music, in the place of Mr. William Shakespeare, who has resigned. The fact of Mr. Barnby having been a student of the Institution, in addition to his having acquired large experience in directing bodies of choral and instrumental executants, renders this a singularly happy choice.

MESSRS. J. & J. HOPKINSON, Pianoforte Manufacturers, of New Bond Street, having intimated their desire to present a Gold Medal to be competed for annually by the Pianoforte Pupils of the Royal College of Music, to be called the "Hopkinson Gold Medal," the Council has accepted the offer, and the First Award will be made at the Annual Examination during the present month.

A SPECIAL service was held at St. Mary's Church, Hornsey, on Tuesday, the 16th ult., when Gaul's "Holy City" was performed by the members of St. Mary's Choral Society, under the direction of Mr. G. W. Spencer, the Organist. The solos and quartets were very ably rendered by members of the Society, and the choruses excellently sung throughout. Mr. W. Hughes presided at the organ.

WE understand that a number of visitors to the Crystal Palace, headed by a lady residing at Norwood, have recently presented a fine pianoforte by Ascherberg, of Dresden, to Mr. Louis Lee. On the front of the instrument is affixed a silver gilt plate, bearing the following inscription:—"To Louis Lee, from numerous friends, in gratitude for delight received at his Pianoforte Recitals, Crystal Palace, 1884."

THE Organ Recital on Saturday, the 6th ult., at the Bow and Bromley Institute, proved to be of more than usual interest, including, as it did, the first appearance at these Recitals of Mr. J. T. Carrodus. The Organist was Mr. W. G. Wood, who performed a selection of English music, including a Scherzo and Allegro of his own composition.

REVIEWS.

MODERN works on the art of singing are so much addressed to the anatomist and physiologist that we cannot but wonder how the great vocalists of former times attained that degree of perfection which they are known to have arrived at without the aid of such knowledge on the training of the voice as we now possess. It is possible that nature does not furnish us with the voices that we used to have; and that, as the same material is not ready to our hand, we are compelled to work harder and study more deeply in order to compensate for this defect—a theory which seems to gain strength by the fact of the present Treatise being founded upon the observations of the methods pursued by such celebrated vocalists as Sontag, Catalani, Tosi, Rubini, Donzelli, Sarti, and Lablache. Dr. Bennati (physician of the Royal Italian Opera of Paris in 1832), we are told, examined the throats of his friends and patients to ascertain the laws of artistic delivery, and that he found no exception to the rule of powerful efforts of the tongue-muscles (which become almost "stone-hard") to the closing, instead of opening, of the upper throat, to the rising of the tongue, and falling of the soft palate when the general high level of singing was preserved. Many of the diagrams scattered throughout the work are reductions of Luschka's life-size figures, others are by Henle, Allen Thompson, and Merkel. We may say that Mr. Howard has practically proved the soundness of the theories laid down in his book; and as it can scarcely be expected that in a brief notice the salient points of this bulky volume can be even catalogued, we cannot do better than refer those interested in the subject to its pages. In justice to the author, however, we quote the following prefatory observations: "For twenty years the writer has spent some hours of each day in devising new and easier ways of voluntarily contracting the muscles of the throat and the respiratory muscles. It was necessary to study the anatomy of the parts in order that a movement might be accredited to the right muscles, and soon the suspicion arose that physiologists had neglected important points. Personal dissection of the parts many times repeated, together with experiments upon specially prepared subjects, revealed extraordinary oversight, especially the failure to see the essential office which the spine, directly behind the larynx, undoubtedly performs in modifying the action of the extrinsic muscles, and, besides that, in deciding the quality of the tone by the laws of consonance. This neglect was due to the practice of removing the larynx from the body before subjecting it to dissection or experiment. A study of acoustic laws was absolutely indispensable to find a safe passage through the labyrinth of blind ideas which writers of all nations and ages had constructed to explain the phenomena of voice." This frank avowal that those who have made the subject their special study merely constructed a "labyrinth of blind ideas" will no doubt arouse much indignation; but Mr. Howard is evidently quite ready to meet with opposition, and only asks that his statements may be fairly investigated. He tells us that the true action of the muscles "could never have been fully decided by comparing one voice with another, or by watching and comparing the changes in the same voice taking place in a year or a month; for this is simply criticising the article after its manufacture, and guessing at the action of the machinery with the aid of such visible signs as the throat and mouth afford." This, at least, is true; and whatever verdict may be ultimately passed upon the result of the author's labours, it must certainly be admitted that he has worked in the right direction.

Short Settings of the Holy Communion Office. Edited by G. C. Martin. No. 8. Composed by Battison Haynes. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

SOME of the earlier numbers of this useful series have already been favourably noticed, and the present is in every way worthy to compare with them. Like Mr. Haynes's Church Music generally, it is distinguished by a flow of stately melody and rich, but not too chromatic, harmony. No solo voices are required for any portion of the service.

Myrthen (Myrtles). A Circle of Songs, with pianoforte accompaniment. Composed by Robert Schumann. Edited and Translated by Natalia Macfarren. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THIS charming circle of vocal pieces, composed in the sunniest days of Schumann's career, and dedicated to his "Beloved Bride," should be cherished as a priceless treasure by all who can appreciate their unforced eloquence. That they are written by an artist for artists is unquestionable; but we can scarcely name one amongst the twenty-six songs contained in the volume which would not appeal with irresistible power even to those who might fail to recognise their more recondite beauties. With regard to the poetry to which they are wedded, we are told that those songs bearing the names of English writers were composed to German translations, and that the English text had to be slightly modified in many places to fit it to the music. In every case we must say that this has been done with infinite skill; and, indeed, few of the songs would excite the slightest suspicion that they had not been composed to the words which appear in this edition. It would perhaps seem invidious to select any from such perfect vocal gems for special mention, but we cannot resist naming No. 2, "The Walnut Tree," No. 4, "Some one"—a true and passionate love-song, to Burns's well known words, "My heart is sair"—No. 7, "The Lotos flower," No. 9, "Suleika's song," No.

10, "The Highland Widow's lament," Nos. 11 and 12, the two "Songs of the Bride," No. 15, "My soul is dark," No. 21, "What would'st thou, lonely teardrop," and No. 25, "A message sweet as roses." It need scarcely be said that to give due effect to these songs both pianist and vocalist must not only be competent, but sympathetic, artists.

Franz Liszt: a memoir. By Frederick F. Buffen.

[Novello, Ewer & Co.]

IN this little brochure, published at the humble price of a shilling, Mr. Buffen places before amateurs facts concerning the career of the illustrious musician who is to be our honoured guest for a brief period in the immediate future, which will be received with avidity by the generality of amateurs. Perhaps the simple reproduction of the "Contents" page, will show how much Mr. Buffen attempts, and what he achieves in the brief course of four chapters, occupying altogether no more than thirty-nine pages. Part I. comprises—Introduction, Characteristics, The Writer, The Player, The Composer, The Man. Part II.—Birth, Early Development of the Musical Faculty, Becomes Pupil of Czerny, His first Concerts, Plays before Beethoven, Visits London and Paris, 1811—1829. Part III.—Life at Paris, Meets Chopin, Madame Sand, and Paganini, Chopin described, In Italy and Vienna, European tour, Beethoven Festival at Bonn, Closes career as virtuoso, 1830—1842. Part IV.—at Weimar, Conclusion, 1843—1886. The style in which Mr. Buffen discourses is for the most part lucid and accurate; but we could wish that he were not so prone to introduce second-hand opinions. For instance, the excerpt from the writings of the Rev. H. R. Haweis could well have been spared. The clerical version of the famous Beethoven kiss is as hereafter:—"Amidst the storm of applause which followed, Beethoven was observed to step on to the platform, take the young virtuoso in his arms and embrace him, as Liszt assured me, on both cheeks." How can we "embrace" a person on both cheeks? Either Mr. Haweis is forgetful of his English, or he does not care to translate idioms of a foreign tongue into the vernacular. Setting aside a few blemishes such as this, Mr. Buffen's little work is welcome, and specially so since it is opportune.

The Hills stand about Jerusalem. By George Gardner. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

Let not your heart be troubled. By George Gardner. [Patey and Willis.]

THE first of these anthems, by a composer whose name is new to us, is for tenor solo and chorus; the former, however, consisting merely of three short phrases. The first and more important movement is a chorus, very free and somewhat secular in manner, especially in the accompaniment, but the concluding section is smooth and church like. The other composition is a full anthem, brief, very pleasing, and as simple as possible. Mr. Gardner has decided talent.

Novello, Ewer and Co.'s Pianoforte Albums. No. 16, Scottish Airs. Arranged for the Pianoforte (four hands) by Otto Schweizer. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THE arranger of these Scottish Airs says in his preface that he has endeavoured in this volume to present the melodies in a shape at once easy and attractive, "making the treble part as simple as possible, without altering the original air, and yet supplying a somewhat more interesting accompaniment than is usually given to the second player." This design has certainly been conscientiously carried out. Four-handed arrangements are always pleasing to young performers; and the harmonies being divided between the two, the thinness inseparable from the simple solo form is avoided. The tunes are well selected, and appropriately harmonised.

The Story of the Cross. Music by H. Elliot Button. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

IN a few days' Passion-tide will be with us once more, and the series of hymns known as "The Story of the Cross," by the late Rev. E. Monro, will be sung in hundreds of our churches. The original consists of twenty-six verses, but Mr. Button has halved the number by running two lines into one. Four tunes are provided, the first two being in triple, and the others in common time. No. 1 is perilously chromatic, but the rest are good; especially the last, which conveys the idea of confidence and triumph admirably.

Novello, Ewer and Co.'s Music Primers. Edited by Dr. Stainer. The Cornet, with adaptations for other instruments; Scales, Exercises, and Solos, and Transposing Table and Scales. By Harry Brett. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THE title-page of this Primer sufficiently indicates its object and contents; and, on a careful perusal of it, we can conscientiously say that both the plan and execution of the work are thoroughly satisfactory. The explanation of the pistons is extremely good, and clear directions are given as to the management of the lips in playing. It must be mentioned too that a lucid exposition of the rudiments of music is given, and in every respect the book is a perfect and reliable guide for those who wish to become really sound performers upon the instrument on which it treats.

FOREIGN NOTES.

THE following interesting gossip anent the present visit paid by Franz Liszt to the French capital, appears in the Daily Telegraph of the 25th ult. :—"The Abbé Liszt is now so averse to performing on the piano—of which instrument he is the greatest virtuoso of the century—that his playing last night (March 23) cannot be passed over without some few words of record. It is true that he appeared at a private soirée, and in the presence of a picked audience only, but the occasion will be remembered as a memorable date in the artistic lives of all who were privileged to be present. The hospitable house wherein welcome was given to the Abbé was that of M. de Munkacz, who is painting the celebrated musician's portrait, and whose striking sketch of his famous model ornamented the programme of the evening's entertainment. Before the Concert began I had the opportunity of having a chat with the Abbé, who spoke much of his early visits to London and of his approaching return there. . . . In spite of his seventy-five years he speaks with wonderful animation and fire, and is almost as erect as a young man. The Concert arranged in his honour consisted of the Preludes for two pianos, suggested by Lamartine's poetry, played by M. Saint-Saëns and M. Diemer; an Hungarian Rhapsody dedicated to M. de Munkacz; the fine Offertory from the Coronation March of the King of Hungary, excellently played by M. Marsick; a violoncello solo entitled 'Consolation' by M. Bürger; and two songs, rendered with infinite charm by Madame Conneau's sympathetic voice. M. Faure also sang one of Gounod's melodies, and, lastly, the hero of the evening sat down to the piano, playing first a composition of Schubert's, arranged by himself, and then a Fantasia of his own, wherein all his manifold power over his instrument came out to the fullest advantage. When one hears and sees the Abbé Liszt at the piano, it is easy to understand the potent charm he has exercised all through his long life, from the time when he was an infant prodigy till to-day, when he has already passed the allotted span of human life. I had never before heard him, so that I have no point of comparison, and cannot say if he is as great as he ever was; but I can declare that he moved his audience as I have rarely seen one moved. You thought but little of the mechanical means employed, so deeply were you impressed by the Abbé's manifest idea of bringing out the very soul of the music which he interpreted. It was a very grand performance, which none of those who heard it will ever forget."

A jubilee performance of Meyerbeer's "Les Huguenots" was given at the Paris Grand Opéra, on the 1st ult., fifty years having elapsed since the first production of the work. "Les Huguenots" would appear to have been the most popular opera performed at that national establishment during the period in question, no less than 786 representations having been recorded, giving an average of sixteen per year; the maximum amount realised by a single performance having been 11,168 francs.

At the Paris Grand Opéra the operas produced during the past month were "Les Huguenots," "Le Cid," "Faust," "Robert le Diable," "Favorita," "Coppélia," and "Sigurd." Signor Gayarre will shortly appear in "L'Africaine," which is being rehearsed.

At the Opéra Comique the following works were given last month: "Richard Cœur de Lion," "Zampa," "Haydée," "Les Contes d'Hoffmann," "Joseph," "Les Rendez-vous-Bourgeois," "Philémon et Baucis," "Le Pré aux Clercs," "Le Nouveau Seigneur," "Le Barbier de Seville," "Les Noces de Jeannette," "Le Maître de Chapelle," "Roméo et Juliette," "Les Diamants," "L'Amour Médecin"—unquestionably a most diversified repertory.

Massenet's opera "Hérodiade" is about to be performed at the Royal Theatre of Lisbon, whither the composer has gone to superintend the final rehearsals of his work. It will be remembered that the opera was first brought out with great success at Brussels a few seasons back.

M. Lasalle, the eminent baritone of the Paris Opéra, is just now giving a series of most successful representations at the Imperial Opera of Vienna.

Liszt's Mass, known as the "Graner Festmesse," was performed on the 25th ult., at the church of St. Eustache, in Paris, with M. Colonne's orchestra, and a choir consisting of male and boys' voices, as the Archbishop of Paris would not allow ladies to take part in the performance, which consequently has scarcely been a satisfactory one. Franz Liszt occupied a chair close to M. Colonne.

M. Saint-Saëns's Opera "Henri VIII.," the projected performance of which, at Prague, had been abandoned in view of the temporary unpopularity of the composer with German audiences, is to be shortly brought out at the Frankfurt Stadt-Theater.

M. Charles Lefebure's sacred drama "Judith" was performed last month by the Stern'sche Gesangverein, of Berlin, and met with a brilliant reception, the composer being present on the occasion.

A young tenor, M. Isouard, a descendant of the still justly esteemed composer, Nicolo Isouard, has just made a very successful début at the Grand Théâtre of Marseilles.

One of the Historical Concerts recently given by the Breslau Gesangverein, under the direction of Dr. E. Böhn, was devoted to compositions by Henry Purcell, comprising arias and choruses from the English master's operas, sacred pieces, and pieces for the harpsichord, including that known as the "Golden Sonata."

We read in the Allgemeine Musik Zeitung:—"The recent performance, at one of the Historical Evenings of the Bohn'sche Gesangverein, of Breslau, of Beethoven's music to 'Leonore,' in its original conception, dating from the year 1805, has created a profound impression upon all present. The work, which in this form has presumably never been heard since the above date, was held to be incomparably fresher, and more grandly conceived, than its two subsequent revisions (when it assumed the title of 'Fidelio'), and it is to be hoped that some portions thereof may be included in future stage-representations of the opera in the same way as the 'Leonore' Overture has already been embodied with the work."

The centenary of the foundation of the Akademische Musikverein at Marburg was celebrated last month with a festive performance, including, among other works, Handel's "Israel in Egypt" and Beethoven's Ninth Symphony.

The complete score of the first stage-work written by the genial composer, Lortzing—viz., an operetta, entitled "Ali Pasha, of Janina," has just been discovered in the archives of the theatre at Detmold. The work emanates from the year 1824, and was only once produced about that time at Cologne. It will probably shortly be revived on the Detmold stage.

Hector Berlioz's opera, "Benvenuto Cellini," is in course of preparation at the German Theatre of Prague.

The present number of pupils of both sexes at the Leipzig Conservatorium is 548.

The following is the list of artists who are to appear alternately in the forthcoming Bayreuth performances of "Tristan und Isolde" and of "Parsifal"—viz., Herren Niemann, Gudehus, Vogl, Winkelmann, Forest, Grupp, Guggenbühler, and Kellerer (tenors); Herren Betz, Fuchs, Plank, Reichmann, Schuegraf (baritones); Herren Reichenberg, Scaria, Siehr, and Wiegand (basses); Mesdames Malten, Materna, Papier, and Sucher. Several of the above are well known to London audiences.

Madame Henriette Viardot, a daughter of Signor Viardot-Garcia, is about to open a vocal academy at Berlin.

The house "am Brühl" in Leipzig, where Richard Wagner first saw the light, is to be pulled down, it having been condemned by the authorities on account of its ruinous and unsafe condition.

Peter Cornelius's comic opera "The Barber of Bagdad," first produced some thirty years ago, under the auspices of Liszt, at the Weimar Hof-Theater, and since then unaccountably neglected, appears at last to be making the round of German theatres, being now in preparation on several of the leading stages at the same time.

The series of Historical Concerts given by Anton Rubinstein at St. Petersburg and Moscow have realised the sum of 80,000 roubles. Out of this amount the great pianist has, it is stated, set aside 25,000 roubles for the foundation of an International Concourse open to young pianists and composers, amongst whom two prizes of 5,000 francs each will be awarded to successful competitors every five years. Competitive Concerts are to be given alternately at the principal European capitals, the jury to be composed of prominent musicians of various nationality. A noble scheme, truly, and worthy of the great artist from whom it emanates.

A new five-act opera, entitled "Saint-Mégrin," founded upon Alexandre Dumas' celebrated drama, "Henri III. et sa Cour," was brought out on the 2nd ult. at the Théâtre de la Monnaie, of Brussels, where it was exceedingly well received. The music is the joint production of two French composers, the brothers Paul and Lucien Hillemaeker, and, in the opinion of the Guide Musical, the work is likely to maintain itself on the répertoire of the De la Monnaie for a considerable time. This is another instance of French dramatic composers having to look for the production of their works outside their native country.

An Academy of Music has been founded at Geneva, where the want of a similar establishment has been felt for some time past. The principal is a lady, well-known on the Continent as an able pianist, Madame Cezano, who is supported by an efficient staff of professors. The institution was opened on February 10 with thirty pupils, the number of which will doubtless, ere long, be considerably increased.

On her recent appearance in "Traviata," at Valencia, Madame Adelina Patti was, in the second act of that opera, severely hissed by the audience, whereupon the diva at once quitted the theatre. The circumstances giving rise to this unique contretemps in the career of the admired songstress are not clearly stated. At Madrid, on the other hand, the gifted vocalist is just now the object of popular ovations.

Beethoven's "Fidelio," the recent first performance of which, at Rome, we recorded in our last "Notes," has failed to meet with the appreciation of the Italians; the sublime and only opera of the master, it should however be added, having been produced in a very mediocre and unsatisfactory style.

The Musikalisches Wochenblatt says: "At the Teatro Social of Mantua, a new opera 'Arminio,' by the Maestro Stefani, met with a very feeble reception, only eleven recalls of the composer having been registered on the occasion." We believe thirty is the minimum number of similar favours required to mark a moderate success with ultramontane audiences.

Several operatic scores have been found amongst the posthumous papers of the Maestro Amilcare Ponchielli, one, entitled "Bertrando da Bormio," having been completed as far back as 1858; another, "I Mori di Valenza," being nearly complete, with the exception of the orchestral parts.

Signor Luigi Arditi, the well-known operatic conductor and composer, is reported dangerously ill at Chicago, U.S.

Signor Giuseppe Rota, a Trieste composer, is the author of both the words and the music of an Oratorio "L'Uomo ed il Tempo," which is divided into three parts, entitled respectively, "Età Prima," "Età Media," and "Età Nuova."

Signor Chiarenze, a grandson of Bellini, is said to be the possessor of a number of fragmentary scores by that famous composer, amongst them that of an opera founded upon Victor Hugo's drama "Ernani." Some numbers from the latter, which are in a complete state, may be expected shortly to be given to the public.

A Choral and Orchestral Concert was given on the 12th ult., at the Oratorio di San Filippo Neri, of Genoa, under the direction of the Maestro Carlo Del Signore, of which the following was the programme:—"Ave verum corpus" (Mozart); Prayer for female voices (Hauptmann); Gipsy Chorus (Schumann); Motett, "O bone Jesu" (Palestrina); "Kyrie" from Mass in B minor (Bach); chorus, "Santa Speme" (Del Signore); "Ave Maria" on Bach's Prelude (Gounod); choral fragments from "Paradise and Peri" (Schumann); "Credo," for double chorus (P. Platanal). The choral portions were executed by the Società Corale di Dilettanti.

A Society has been founded at Turin for the purpose of giving annually recurring Symphony Concerts in that town.

Herr August Wilhelmj, the eminent violinist, is giving a series of Concerts at St. Petersburg and Moscow to enthusiastic audiences.

A young lady, Mdle. Juliette Folville, the daughter of a barrister, is just now attracting considerable notice in Belgian musical circles in the threefold capacity of violinist, pianist, and composer. She is only fifteen years of age.

A monument to the Italian poet and librettist Metastasio, is in course of erection in the square of San Silvestro, at Rome. It is the work of the sculptor Gallori.

A new music journal has been started at Bordeaux, entitled La Réforme Artistique.

The death is announced at Paris of Luigi Bordeese, a prolific composer of operas, some of which have been successfully produced in the French capital, where he has long been resident. He was born at Naples in 1815.

At Paris died, on February 28, at the age of fifty-seven, Marc Bonnehée, once a popular baritone singer at the Grand Opéra, where he "created" many important rôles, and since 1879 a professor of his art at the Conservatoire.

Eugène Delaporte, the zealous advocate of choral singing in France, to whose efforts some thousands of choral societies owe their origin, died in a Paris hospital, aged sixty-eight. M. Delaporte and his "Orphéonistes," it will be remembered, gave performances in this country some twenty years ago.

Paul Seiffert, the founder of an excellent choir for à capella performances, and a composer of merit, died at Berlin, on February 16, at the early age of forty-eight.

We have also to announce the death of Louis Köhler, the eminent German musical savant, an event to which we specially refer in another column.

THE RISELEY CASE.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—The author of an article in THE MUSICAL TIMES for this month, writes under an evident misapprehension of facts. I will only deal with what relates to myself. He says: "The main cause of the dissension, however, seemed to be that on one occasion he (the Organist) had substituted for an Anthem chosen by the Precentor one especially selected by himself, on account of the absence of two leading vocalists. This, of course, musically considered, was a sufficient reason for the change, &c." By characterising this incident as "the main cause of the dissension," the writer puts a false complexion on the whole matter. The litigation had nothing to do with the Precentor. I quote the Chancellor's own words: "Mr. Riseley was not dismissed for anything connected with the Precentor at all." It was a case solely between Dean and Chapter, and Organist; and no question whatever as between Precentor and Organist was adjudicated upon. In corroboration of this, I refer to a letter from the Dean of Bristol, at page 168 of this month's MUSICAL TIMES. But, further, I am led to infer from the above quotation, that the writer is unacquainted with the Statutes of Cathedrals of the New Foundation, which regulate the respective offices of Precentor and Organist. These Statutes are moulded from a common pattern, and differ very little. At Bristol the Organist is one chosen beside the Lay clerks "skilful both in singing and in playing upon the organ, who shall diligently spend his time in instructing the boys, in playing upon the organ at proper times, and in singing Divine Service." There his duty ends. But of the Precentor it is enjoined that "All the Minor Canons and Clerks, and others entering the Choir to sing, shall obey him in whatever concerns the business of the Choir. Whatsoever he shall have prescribed to be read or sung, they ought promptly to obey." Thus it does not appertain to the Organist's sphere of duty to appoint or change the music of the Cathedral, such responsibility resting entirely with the Precentor. Moreover, I may remark that on the occasion adverted to I had ample reasons for the course which I adopted.—I am, Sir, very faithfully yours,

WILLIAM MANN, Precentor of Bristol.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—In the report of the annual dinner of the South London Musical Club, in your March number, Dr. Stainer is made to say: "He had himself recently refused to join a Society which had for its main object the drawing of a straight line between the professional and the amateur. He never wanted to see that straight line drawn."

Will you permit me to say that Dr. Stainer is confusing terms? It is only as regards the constitution of the Society that the "straight line" complained of is drawn. How a Society of Professional musicians could be true to its name, and act otherwise, is difficult to understand. The relations of the amateur and professional remain as they were, nor is there any attempt to define them as will be seen by Mr. Chadfield's remarks on the recent conference, in the last number of the Quarterly Musical Review.

Our objects are such as should commend themselves to all thinking amateurs. We but exercise an undoubted right in uniting for mutual aid and consultation in our own proper business.

We would naturally rather have Dr. Stainer with than against us; we shall not be discouraged in our work, and may venture even to hope that when Dr. Stainer knows more about us he will no longer hold aloof, but will be equally solicitous for the welfare of both the professional and the amateur.—I am, Sir, faithfully yours,

STEPHEN S. STRATTON.

CHARLES DIBDIN.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—In reply to the interesting letter of Mr. Edward Rimbaud Dibdin, which appeared in THE MUSICAL TIMES for this month, I beg to say that Charles Dibdin was, according to my musical records, baptized on the 4th March, 1745, and as his father was not only a Silversmith, but the Clerk of Holyrood Church, Southampton, the baptismal register of the composer of our sea-songs can no doubt be found among the archives of that Church.

The inscription on Dibdin's tomb in St. Martin's burial ground, Camden Town, states that he died on the 25th July, 1814, aged 69, which proves that he was born in 1745.

Yours truly,

JOSHUA D. HORWOOD.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

. Notices of concerts, and other information supplied by our friends in the country, must be forwarded as early as possible after the occurrence; otherwise they cannot be inserted. Our correspondents must specifically denote the date of each concert, for without such date no notice can be taken of the performance.

Our correspondents will oblige by writing all names as clearly as possible, as we cannot be responsible for any mistakes that may occur.

Correspondents are informed that their names and addresses must accompany all communications.

We cannot undertake to return offered contributions; the authors, therefore, will do well to retain copies.

Notice is sent to all Subscribers whose payment (in advance) is exhausted. The paper will be discontinued where the Subscription is not renewed. We again remind those who are disappointed in obtaining back numbers that, although the music is always kept in stock, only a sufficient quantity of the rest of the paper is printed to supply the current sale.

A YOUNG CHOIRMASTER.—It is the custom to sound the "ed" in the words named. In the instance quoted, two monosyllabic words go to the first two of the minims, and by analogy the last minim should have "prais-ed" sung to it.

WILLIAM WAIT.—The composer of the piece mentioned by our correspondent is Franz Schubert.

BRIEF SUMMARY OF COUNTRY NEWS.

We do not hold ourselves responsible for any opinions expressed in this Summary, as all the notices are either collated from the local papers or supplied to us by correspondents.

ABERDEEN, N.B.—The principal portions of Judas Maccabeus were performed by the members of the Choral Union, on the 18th ult., before a large audience. The soloists—Miss Vinnie Beaumont, Mr. Howell, and Mr. Black—were well received, Miss Beaumont especially creating a most favourable impression. Mr. Johnston conducted.

AYR, N.B.—Judas Maccabeus was performed before a crowded audience, on the 4th ult., by the Choral Union. The work was well rendered under the Conductor, Mr. H. McNabb. The soloists were Miss Vinnie Beaumont, Mr. W. Macdonald, and Mr. Duncan, all of whom were thoroughly efficient.

BANGOR, CO. DOWN.—The members of the Musical Society gave their second Concert on Friday evening, the 5th ult. The programme consisted of part-songs and vocal solos. Among the principal vocalists were Mrs. T. H. Crowe, Miss Culbert, Messrs. Neill, Cotton, and Brown, of Belfast. Mrs. Crowe, who possesses a well-cultured voice, was highly successful in her solos. Mr. T. H. Crowe conducted, and the precision and tone exhibited in the part-singing showed careful and intelligent training of the voices, especially in the unaccompanied items.

BARNOLDSWICK, YORKSHIRE.—On Wednesday, the 17th ult., a Choral Concert was given in the Wesleyan Chapel before a large audience. There was a full band and chorus numbering about 150 performers. The programme consisted of selections from The Messiah and Judas Maccabeus. The principal vocalists were Miss Bessie Holt, R.A.M., Miss Eastwood, Mr. T. Sharpley, and Mr. G. Sowerby. The choruses were effectively rendered, reflecting much credit on the careful training of Mr. Peter Pickup, who conducted with great ability. Mr. V. Wilkinson led the band, and Mr. J. Turner Smith, A.Mus., T.C.L., organist of the Parish Church, Skipton, ably accompanied. The Concert was in aid of the Circuit Funds, and over £30 was handed to the Treasurer.

BELEFAST.—The third Chamber Concert of the Philharmonic Society took place in the Ulster Minor Hall, on the 8th ult., the executives being Herr Ernest Schiever (violin), Herr Rudersdorf (violinello), and Herr Adam Boyce (pianoforte). Beethoven's great Trio in D major and Schubert's Trio in E flat major, were finely played by the above-mentioned artists; Herr Schiever gave an excellent rendering of Tartin's Sonata in C minor, and Herr Rudersdorf performed in a masterly manner Beethoven's Sonata in A major, for violinello and pianoforte, Herr Beyschlag sustaining the part for the last-named instrument in both Sonatas with his usual success. Louis Mantel was the vocalist in the evening, and sung with much effect songs by Schubert and Schumann. The Musical Director of the Concert was, of course, Herr Beyschlag.

BERWICK-UPON-TWEED.—On Tuesday, the 5th ult., the United Choral Unions of Alnwick, Berwick, and Morpeth, gave a performance of Haydn's Creation in the Corn Exchange. The combined choirs numbered upwards of 250 voices, and the orchestra, consisting principally of instrumentalists from Alnwick and Morpeth, with the assistance of a few professional players, was thoroughly efficient. The solo singers were Miss Mackenzie, Mr. T. Richardson, and Mr. Nutton, all of whom gave most successful performances. A noteworthy feature of the performance was the splendid chorus-singing, which was characterised by a precision and promptness in attack, evoking the highest admiration and enthusiasm from the vast audience. Mr. Barker, of Berwick, was Conductor, and under his skilful guidance every number was given with much smoothness and steadiness. Mr. C. S. Wise presided at the harmonium.

BEVERLEY.—The Musical Society gave its twenty-fourth Members' Concert on the 2nd ult. The programme comprised part-songs, which were excellently rendered by the Society, and solos and duets by Miss Vinnie Beaumont, Mr. E. Dunkerton, and Mr. Munroe. Mr. Honeyman, the Conductor, played a pianoforte solo, and Mr. Ridgway gave Handel's Violin Concerto in A major. The Concert was very successful.

BOLTON.—A successful Evening Concert was given in the All Saints' Church Schools, on the 8th ult. The principal artists were Mrs. Vose, Miss Marsh, Mr. Pimblett, and Mr. Binn, all of whom were highly appreciated. Mr. J. E. Liprott conducted and accompanied. Mrs. Jeavons played two pianoforte solos, and the choir sang with taste and precision.—On the 11th ult., a Concert was given in the Wesley Church, the principal artists being Miss Frodsham, Mr. Taylor, and Mr. Burton.

BRISBANE, QUEENSLAND.—The Liedertafel Society, under the conductorship of Mr. J. A. Pollard, gave its first Smoking Concert on January 13, and was most successful. A number of members of one of the City Presbyterian Churches have formed themselves into a "Scotch Choir," under the directorship of Mr. R. J. Scott, the Organist of the church, and lately gave a most enjoyable Concert, at which several popular Scotch songs—arranged as part-songs—were capably sung before a truly sympathetic audience.—The thirteenth annual Meeting of members of the Brisbane Musical Union, was held on January 14, under the presidency of Sir Charles Lilley, C.M.G., Chief Justice, the President of the Society. The report showed the affairs of the Union to be in a highly prosperous condition, the effective strength at the close of the year being 144 performing members, thirty-eight of whom are in the orchestra. The property of the Society now amounts to nearly £500. It possesses one of the best musical libraries in Australia, and a fair number of musical instruments. The works performed by the Society during the year were Mendelssohn's Athalie, Mackenzie's The Bride, Handel's Acis and Galatea, and The Messiah, besides numerous selections, both vocal and instrumental. Amongst the compositions to be given during the present year are Mackenzie's Rose of Sharon, Mendelssohn's St. Paul, and other works of a high class character. Mr. R. T. Jeffries, the founder of the Society, continues to give his valuable services as Conductor, and to mark their sense of the respect in which he is held by the members of the Union, they recently rendered him a complimentary Concert, on which occasion the theatre was crowded. Being an amateur Society, its weakest point is in its solo singers, but there are several who not only possess excellent voices, but who give a highly intelligent rendering of the music allotted to them.

BRISTOL.—On Monday evening, the 8th ult., a Miscellaneous Concert was given by the Bedminster St. Paul's Choral Union, in the large schoolroom. Songs were admirably rendered by Miss Marie Gane, Mr. T. H. Pearce, and Mr. Wall; Mr. T. Packer contributed vocal solos, and pianoforte selections were given by Misses Storrs and Pether. Several glees were sung by the Choir, ably conducted by Mr. W. Nurse.

CHAPELTOWN, SHEFFIELD.—The Sacred Harmonic Society, under the patronage of the Earl of Wharfedale, gave its fourth annual Concert, on Monday, the 15th ult., when Mendelssohn's Elijah was excellently rendered. The band and Chorus numbered upwards of 120 performers. The principal artists were Miss Bessie Holt, R.A.M., Miss Dews, Mr. Macdonald, and Mr. Goodhead, all of whom were very successful, and the praise being due to Miss Dews, who sang with much taste and ability. The chorus singing was admirable. Mr. J. Sheldon Hague conducted.

CIRENCISTER.—The members of the Choral Society gave their annual Concert on the 9th ult., in the Corn Hall, when Handel's Oratorio Judas Maccabæus was performed with full band. The solo vocalists were Madame Paget, Miss Dones, Mr. E. T. Morgan, and Mr. A. Thomas. Mr. E. G. Woodward led the band, Miss Martin presided at the pianoforte, Mr. W. Miller at the American organ, and Mr. Edward Brind conducted. The work was excellently rendered throughout.

CORK.—The third and fourth performances of Mr. Stanislaus Elliott's new Opera Ballaahaddarran, produced at the Theatre Royal, Liverpool, was played at the Opera House, on the 4th and 5th ult. The work was excellently cast and mounted, and enthusiastically received. —The Concert by the pupils of the School of Music took place on the 5th ult., before a numerous audience. The selection of Spohr's Christian's Prayer was a good one, as it displayed to much advantage the fresh voices of the students, without making undue demands upon their powers. Much individual merit was manifested in the second part, which was a miscellaneous Misses H. and J. McDermott, O'Keefe, Weeks, and Reynolds (pianoforte) being highly successful in their solos; and Miss O'Callaghan and Mr. Paul showing very decisive talent as vocalists. The Concert was admirably conducted by Mr. T. J. Sullivan.

COVENTRY.—Mr. F. W. Humberstone, for several years Honorary Secretary of the Musical Society, gave a Concert in the Corn Exchange, on Friday, the 5th ult. There was a large and appreciative audience. The artists were Mrs. Mason, Miss Emilie Lloyd, Mr. Edward Lloyd, and Mr. Robert Grice (vocalists); Mr. Hopkins Hann (solo violin); Mr. W. H. Hann (solo cello), and Mr. C. Kewling (solo pianoforte and accompanist). The band and chorus numbered upwards of 150, and Mr. Humberstone conducted. The first part consisted of the Concert-giver's Cantata The Entry into Jerusalem, which was received with unmistakable marks of approbation. Mr. Lloyd gave a most pathetic rendering of the air "If thou hadst known," and in the second part his singing of Gounod's "Land me, Land me," was a most successful vocalism. The latter was a well-merited recall for the air "Jesu, the very thought is sweet," and afterwards gave a fine rendering of Mendelssohn's "Infelice," with orchestral accompaniment. Miss Emilie Lloyd sang the air "Come unto Him," in the Cantata, with much effect, and was equally successful in the second part. Mr. Grice, in the Recitative "When is the promise of His coming?" and in the instrumental duet with Mr. Lloyd, displayed a telling baritone voice and good musical instinct. The solo instrumentalists were also thoroughly efficient.

DARLINGTON.—The annual Festival of St. John's Musical Society was held on Monday evening, the 8th ult., in St. John's Church. The festival commenced with a brief service including a short address from the Vicar, the Rev. J. G. Richardson, M.A., after which selections from the works of Mozart, Mendelssohn, Haydn, and Handel were rendered with good effect by the members of the Society, under the conductorship of Mr. W. Ingram. The solos were sung by Mrs. E. M. H. Wells, Mr. H. W. Gifford, and Mr. F. M. Charles Stephenson, A.C.O., Organist of the Church, ably accompanied.

DUBLIN.—The performance by the Musical Society of the Oratorio The Three Holy Children, composed by Dr. Charles Villiers Stanford for the Birmingham Festival of 1885, took place, on the 8th ult., at the Theatre Royal, University Halling. The solo vocalists were, under the soloists—Miss Anna Williams, Messrs. Henry Piercy, John Horan, jun., Egbert Roberts, and J. M. Jones—giving much effect to the music allotted to them, and Mr. Robinson's choir singing all the exacting choruses with admirable precision. The band was ably led by Mr. Levey, Mr. John Horan presided at the organ, and Mr. J. H. Cockerell was harpist. At the close of the performance the applause was most enthusiastic.

DUDLEY.—A performance of Haydn's Creation was successfully given by the Vocal Union, on the 23rd ult., in the Public Hall. The principal vocalists were Miss Lillie Mills, Mr. A. J. Smith, and Mr. John Kidding, all of whom were received with enthusiastic applause. An efficient band of twenty performers was ably led by Mr. James Hale, the recitatives being accompanied on the American organ by Mr. W. H. Aston, A.T.C., accompanist to the Society. Mr. B. Barlow conducted.

DOVER.—A highly successful Concert was given in the Town Hall on Tuesday, the 9th ult., by the members of the Harmonic Society. The programme consisted of Handel's Serenata Aida and Valencia and a miscellaneous selection. The solo vocalists were Miss Kate Norman, Mr. J. G. McBryde, Mr. G. W. Gifford, and Mr. T. Kempton. Mr. Howells conducted throughout with marked ability.

DUMBARTON, N.B.—Romberg's Lay of the Bell was selected for performance by the Choral Union for its fourth Concert of the season on the 12th ult., in the Lecture Hall, which was well filled with an appreciative audience. The solos were sung by Miss Winnie Beaumont and Messrs. Howell and Black.

DUNFERMLINE, N.B.—The Dunfermline Combined Choirs gave their annual Concert in St. Margaret's Hall, on the 15th ult., before a large audience. Several choruses were excellently rendered, under the conductorship of Mr. James Moodie. The solo artists were Miss Winnie Beaumont, Mr. Seymour Jackson, and Mr. D. Harrison, who were highly successful in their several songs. Mr. D. Harley, A.M., Organist of the Abbey, accompanied.

EASTBOURNE.—A Ballad Concert, under the direction of Mr. C. Roper, was given on the 4th ult., at the Pavilion, Devonshire Park. The vocalists were Miss Bertha Moore, Madame Joyce Maas, and Mr. D. Sutton Shenley. Instrumental solos were contributed by Mr. F. A. Earnshaw (violin) and Mr. E. Smith (harp), and a rendering was given by the Rev. H. C. Wilson. The Concert was in every respect a success.

ELGIN.—Mr. F. W. Minns gave his farewell Recital in the Parish Church, on Monday evening, the 1st ult., before a large audience. An excellent programme was well rendered and thoroughly appreciated. Mr. Asher contributed vocal solos with much effect.

FROME.—A very successful Concert was given by Mr. W. Haydn Cox, L.R.A.M., on the 1st ult., at the Mechanics' Hall. The Concert-giver played solos on the pianoforte and Mustel organ. The vocalists were the Misses Marshall-Ward, and Mr. W. Thomas; instrumentalists, Mr. W. E. Cox (violin), Miss Laura Cox (piano), and Mr. P. W. Crutwell (horn). There was a large audience.

GIRVAN, N.B.—The ninth Annual Concert of the Musical Association took place on the 12th ult., when Handel's Coronation Anthem, Mendelssohn's Hail my Prayer, and a miscellaneous selection formed the programme. The works were well rendered and much appreciated. The artists were Miss Winnie Beaumont, Mr. Dunsmore, and Mr. Allan. Mr. H. McNabb conducted.

GOSPORT.—The Monday Popular Concerts, which have been given during the winter in the Thorgate Hall, were brought to a close on Monday, the 8th ult., when the proceedings took the form of a Complimentary Concert to Mr. Miller. The vocalists were Miss Bertha Moore and Mr. Sidney Smith. Mr. Harvey Riches, assisted by amateurs, played with much success Mendelssohn's First Trio, for violin, viola, and pianoforte, and the 4th of the Royal Marriage (of which Mr. Miller is the Conductor) formed the orchestra. A new Concert Overture (Evangeline), composed by Mr. Miller, was produced, and created a favourable impression. The hall was crowded in every part, and the Concert was in every way most successful.

GRAYS.—A Concert was given, on Thursday, the 17th ult., in aid of the funds of the 2nd Battery 1st Essex Artillery Volunteers. The artists were Miss Adela Duckham, Mrs. Howell, Mrs. Rea Corbett, Mr. J. H. Duckham, Mr. David Davies, Mr. F. Sheppy, Mr. Vingrove, and Mr. Ridgwell. The programme was a very good one, the violin solos being Berlioz's "Scène de Ballet" and Schubert's Romance and Bolero—by Miss Adela Duckham being special features. Mr. David Davies ably conducted.

GREENHITHE.—The Swanscombe Choral Society gave its first Concert on Tuesday, the 2nd ult., at Ye Village Hall (by kind permission of R. S. Dunbar, Esq.). The programme consisted of Cowen's Rose Maiden. The solos were well rendered by Miss Kate Johnstone, R.A.M., Miss Annie West, R.A.M., Mr. T. W. Page, R.C.M., and Mr. Hailes. The Gravesend Orchestral Society performed the accompaniments. Mr. Wakefield presided at the organ, Miss Wood at the pianoforte, and Mr. T. H. Jones conducted. The Concert was well attended and much appreciated.

GREENWICH.—Madame Jenny Latham gave a Concert, on Monday, the 8th ult., in the Lecture Hall, assisted by Madame Kirchmann, Madame Frith, Miss Ricardo, Messrs. Sydney Cozens and Eversfield, Mitchell. The Concert-giver, who possesses a good and powerful soprano voice, was highly successful in Bishop's "Tell me, my heart," Wade's duet "I've wandered in dreams," and Barnett's trio "This Magic-wave Scarf." Mr. Henchie rendered valuable aid as a reciter. Master Tom Latham's violin solos were received with enthusiasm, and Miss Jenny Latham gave a brilliant and intelligent rendering of her pianoforte solos, which included Mendelssohn's Andante and Rondo Capriccioso. Mr. B. Vine Westbrook, F.C.O., accompanied.

GUILDFORD.—The highest credit must be awarded to Mr. H. T. Tiltman, F.C.O., for having aided his class given a most successful evening Concert at the Western Hall, on the 8th ult., at the former of which was performed Dvorák's Stabat Mater, and at the latter Gounod's Redemption. It need scarcely be said that the preparation of two such important works necessitates much careful and earnest labour; and it must have been a source of much gratification to all concerned to find that their efforts were so thoroughly successful. At the after, Miss Sophie Smith, the soprano solos were admirably sung by Madame Worrell, and in the "Inflammatum," Madame Fasseti elicited the warmest applause. Mendelssohn's unfinished Opera Lorelei followed the Stabat Mater, and again gave Madame Worrell an opportunity of displaying her excellent voice and style to the utmost advantage in the soprano music. The Redemption, in the evening, was fully appreciated by a large audience, the solo singers—Madame Worrell, Miss Sophie Smith, Madame Fasseti, Messrs. A. Kennelham and Frank Walker—being in every respect thoroughly efficient. At both Concerts the singing of the choir was everything that could be desired.

HALIFAX.—The last Concert of the season took place on Wednesday, the 17th ult., a feature in the programme being the singing of the St. John's Wesleyan Choir, one of the best choirs in Yorkshire, numbering about forty members, mostly amateurs. Mr. T. Cain conducted. The solo vocalists were Mr. Charles Farrar and Mr. Simeon Schofield, both of whom were highly successful. Mr. Booth, the Organist, was an excellent accompanist.

REMARKS.—The members of the Vocal Union gave a very successful performance of Judas Maccabæus on Tuesday evening, the 5th ult., at the Corn Exchange. The band and chorus numbered about seventy. The soloists were Miss Julia Jones, Miss Florence Evans, Mr. Castings, and Rev. J. H. Lambert.

RUGLEY.—On Tuesday evening, February 23, a Concert was given in the Town Hall, by the members of the Choral Society, assisted by the Lichfield Organist. The first part of the programme consisted of Cowen's Cantata Sleeping Beauty, and the second was miscellaneous. The solos in the Cantata were exceedingly well sung by Mrs. HOBLEY, Miss LOTT, Mr. W. F. COX, and Mr. C. HOBLEY, and the rendering of the choruses was highly satisfactory. The Conductors were Mr. Gladman and Mr. J. B. Lott, Organist of Lichfield Cathedral.

SALISBURY.—A Concert was given in the Assembly Rooms on the 8th ult., the programme consisting of Storer's Cantata The Tournament, and Spontini's The Gipsies. The solo vocalists were Madame Clara West, Miss Jeanie Rosse, Mr. J. M. Hayden, and the Rev. T. H. Spinney; leader of the orchestra, Mr. Calkin; Conductor, Mr. T. E. Spinney. There was a large and appreciative audience, and the Concert was a great success.

SELBY.—The Choral Class, which has been in existence about ten years, has already performed the following compositions:—The Messiah, Creation, St. Paul, Samson, Woman of Samaria, Macfarren's May Day, Sterndale Bennett's May Queen, Barnett's Building of the Ship, Cowen's Rose Maiden and Sleeping Beauty, Gadsby's Lord of the Isles, Goldwall's On Shore and Sea. The Class is greatly indebted to Mr. Eggleshaw, its Conductor, for the skill and patience he has brought to bear upon the preparation of these works, and also to the accompanists, Mrs. Greeves and Mr. Sykes, F.C.O. On Shrove Tuesday the Class formed the Special Choir for a performance, in the old Abbey Church, of Sullivan's Festival Te Deum, which took the place of the Anthem. An earnest and appropriate address was given at the conclusion of the service by Canon Clasper, vicar of Buckingham, of Harrogate, sang the solos, Mr. Eggleshaw conducted, and Mr. Sykes accompanied on the organ. A small band strengthened the accompaniment in the last chorus. The service was highly impressive, the congregation joining heartily in the psalm, hymns, and responses. The collection was given to the fund for providing soup for the poor.

SEVENOAKS.—An evening Concert, under the direction of Mr. Arthur W. Marcelant, Mus. Bac., Oxon. (Organist and Choirmaster of the Park Church), was given at the Royal Crown Hotel, on Wednesday, the 3rd ult., the artists being Miss Lucy Madam, Poole, M. L. Fryer, and Mr. F. May, vocalists; Mr. C. H. Allen Gill, violoncello; and Mr. O. S. Marshall, solo pianist. A miscellaneous programme was excellently rendered.

STALYBRIDGE.—A very successful Organ Recital was given in the Congregational Church, on February 23, by Mr. J. B. Thompson, Organist of the Wesleyan Chapel, Ashton-under-Lyne. The vocalist was Miss Alice Walker, who sang with much taste. The programme included Mendelssohn's Organ Sonata, No. 2; Prelude and Fugue in A minor (J. S. Bach); Bell Rondo (Morand), and selections from Beethoven, Gullmatt, Mozart, &c. Mr. Sidney Hall, A.C.O., gave a Popular Concert in the Mechanics' Institution, on the 13th ult., before an appreciative audience. The vocalists were Miss K. Fusselle, L.R.A.M., Mollie, d'Arconville, R.A.M., and Mr. F. May, R.A.M., all of whom were highly successful. The Misses J. and F. Hudson, G.S.M., contributed harp and violin solos, which were well received. Mr. Arthur Kay gave a very effective pianoforte solo, shared the duties of accompanist with the Concert-giver.

STOCKPORT.—On Monday, the 22nd ult., the Musical Society gave a Concert in the Volunteer Armory. Drak's Squire's Bride was the first item on the programme. The part of the Spectator was taken by Mr. Charles Blagbro, that of the Bride by Miss Conway, and the bass solos by Mr. J. Barrow. The Cantata was very effectively rendered. The second part of the programme included Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsodie (No. 1) in F, March and Chorus from Tannhäuser, &c. The band and chorus numbered 150 performers, most of the former being from Mr. Hall's orchestra. Mr. Jos. Bradley, Mus. Bac., Oxon., was the Conductor. The performance was, throughout, most successful. We hear with regret that these Concerts, being conducted at a loss, must be discontinued.

STOKES-ON-TRENT.—On Thursday, the 11th ult., an Organ Recital was given in St. Jude's Church by Dr. E. M. Taylor, Organist of St. Mary's, Stafford, on the occasion of the dedication of a new organ, the gift of Mr. Keeling. A crowded congregation testified to the rapidly growing love of high-class organ music, which on this occasion included selections from Bennett, Smart, Mendelssohn, Merkel, and Baistie, all of which found an able exponent in Dr. Taylor.

STRATFORD.—On Monday evening, the 8th ult., the Upton Choral Society entered upon its fourth season by giving a Concert in the Town Hall before a large audience. The programme was taken by Mrs. Davies, Miss F. A. Jones, Mr. Hirwen Jones, and Herr Emil Mahr; Conductor, Mr. Joseph Proudman. The programme comprised Mendelssohn's "Come, let us sing," violin solos, songs, and part-songs. The programme was excellently rendered. Mr. F. C. Kitson and Mr. G. B. Gilbert were the accompanists.

WARMISTON.—The Musical Association, conducted by Mr. T. J. Lesman, Organist of the Parish Church, gave an interesting Concert, on the 2nd ult., when J. F. Barnett's Cantata, The Ancient Mariner, was successfully performed by a band and chorus of seventy performers. The band was led by Dr. Alcock, Head Master of Lord Weymouth's Grammar School, who was supported by two sons and five daughters, on stringed instruments; also, Mr. H. Millington (Mustel organ), Mr. Parsons (cornet), and the Rev. J. H. Pearson (contra-basso). The solo vocalists were Mrs. Jeans, R.A.M.; Messrs. Morgan and Thomas, principal tenor and bass respectively, of Bristol Cathedral, all of whom were highly successful. The choruses were excellently sung, the difficulties especially distinguishing themselves in some of the more difficult numbers. The second part was miscellaneous. Miss B. Cornish was at the pianoforte, and rendered great assistance.

WARRINGTON.—On Friday, the 19th ult., the Musical Society (established in 1833) gave a Miscellaneous Concert, including Macfarren's May Day, and choral works by Gounod, Fanning, Sterndale Bennett, &c. Among the soloists, Miss Wallington was especially successful, singing with much effect Donizetti's "Com' è bello," and Sieber's "The Bird's Lay" (encored). Miss Monk possesses a good contralto voice and great self-possession. She was encored in Pissuti's "Dream of Peace," and warmly applauded in Stainer's very graceful "Slumber song." The two ladies were also highly successful in several duets.

WATERFOOT.—The annual Concert in connection with the Newchurch Constitutional Association took place at Brougham Hall, on Thursday, the 4th ult. The vocalists were Miss Bessie Holt, Miss Louisa Bowmont, Mr. George Barton, and Mr. Whitaker, all of whom were highly successful and thoroughly appreciated. Mr. Norris contributed a pianoforte solo, and accompanied the vocal music.

WHITBY.—On Monday evening, the 22nd ult., the Choir of Brunswick Wesleyan Chapel gave a very excellent rendering of Darnton's Cantata The Heavenly Shepherd before a large and appreciative audience. The solos, duets, and quartets were well rendered, and the choruses carefully sung by a well trained choir. Mr. Kennison presided at the organ with his usual ability, and the Rev. Joseph Little, of the Silver collection was taken at the close towards the relief of the distressed poor in the town.

WIGAN.—The second Concert, arranged by Mr. G. L. Coombs, took place in the Volunteer Drill Hall, on Monday, the 22nd ult. A feature of the programme being the performance of the band of the 1st Northamptonshire Regiment. The principal vocalists were Miss Bessie Holt (who was warmly applauded in all her songs), Madame E. Young, and Mr. E. Grime. The accompanist was Mr. C. Grime.

WINDSOR.—On February 24, at the Albert Institute, a Concert was given, the principal item in which was a new Cantata by Robert Parker Paine, the Libretto by Claxson Bellamy, entitled From Death into Life. The work was received with every manifestation of approval, a strong desire being expressed that it should be repeated at an early date. The local papers speak highly of the Cantata, as well as of its excellent rendition by the choir, which, with the band, consisted of about seventy performers. The principal singers were Miss Annie Knowles, Miss Amy Claphaw, and Mr. Fred. Bevan; Mr. Hubert Hunt was leader of the band, Mr. Claphaw presided at the pianoforte, and Mr. G. F. Huntley at the harmonium.

WORKING.—The members of the Sacred Harmonic Society gave an excellent performance of Handel's Oratorio Samson, at the Assembly Rooms, on Monday evening, the 8th ult. The solo vocalists were Madame Wilson-Osman, Madame Poole, Mr. Charles Chilly, and Mr. Musgrove Tufnell. There was an efficient orchestra, led by Mr. A. Burnett; the Recitatives were accompanied on the pianoforte by Mr. F. H. Simms, Organist of Ryde Parish Church, and Mr. T. E. Aylward, Organist of Chichester Cathedral, conducted. The trumpet obbligato to "Let the bright Seraphim," was ably played by Mr. A. H. Collet.

WOLD.—The members of the Choral Society gave their last Concert of the season at the Town Hall, on Tuesday, the 9th ult. The first part consisted of Van Bree's Cantata St. Cecilia's Day, the solo parts being carefully rendered by Miss Helena Edwards. Mr. Adams presided at the pianoforte, Mr. Casson at the harmonium, and Mr. Felix C. Watkins conducted.

ORGAN WORKS

BY CHARLES WILLIAM PEARCE,
Mus. Doc., Cantab.

THESE Pieces have been written either (1) as developments of Hymn Tunes, or (2) as musical illustrations of some Scriptural event or poetical idea. Hymns have at all times entered largely into the religious life of every nation; and Solo Organ Music, even in its earliest and most rudimentary form, has ever been closely connected with Hymn Tunes and Chorals. Little apology is therefore needed for the introduction of occasional choral effects in music written to supply the growing need of Compositions appropriate for Organ Recitals given in Church. Ancient Hymn Tunes have, from long use, become inseparably attached to the Hymns for which they were composed; and, from their solidity of construction, are better suited than Modern Tunes for purposes of treatment and elaboration.

1. FOUR SHORT AND EASY PIECES (First Set). Op. 5. Second Edition. Dedicated to Alfred King, Esq., Mus. Bac., Organist to the Corporation, Brighton. 1. Morning Song (Prelude); 2. Communion; 3. Melody; 4. Evensong. Price 2s. 6d. net.
2. FOUR SHORT AND EASY PIECES (Second Set). Op. 10. Consisting of Meditations on Keble's Poem, "Forest Leaves in Autumn," in the Christian Year. Dedicated to E. H. Turpin, Esq., Hon. Sec., College of Organists. 1. A Sunset Réverie; 2. Autumn Song; 3. Requiem; 4. Spring Song. Price 2s. 6d. net.

These two Sets of Short and Easy Pieces are intended as Studies to follow the use of Dr. Stainer's Organ Primer.

3. POSTLUDE IN E FLAT MAJOR. Op. 7. Dedicated to Dr. C. L. Frost. Published (with other Compositions) in Part LII. of the "Organist's Quarterly Journal." Price 2s. 6d. net.
4. INTERMEZZO IN A MAJOR. Op. 13. Dedicated to Dr. Spark. Published in Part LVII. of the "Organist's Quarterly Journal." Price 2s. 6d. net.
5. POSTLUDE FESTIVUM. Op. 22. Dedicated to Dr. E. M. Lott. Published in Part LXV. of the "Organist's Quarterly Journal." Price 2s. 6d. net.

London: NOVELLO, EWER and Co.

6. THREE HYMN STUDIES. Op. 25. Dedicated to Dr. H. A. Harding. 1. Creator of the starry height (Advent); 2. Jesus, the very thought is sweet (Epiphany); 3. Faithful Cross, above all other (Passion-tide). Price 3s. net.
7. URBS BEATA, HIERUSALEM. Postlude for a Dedication Festival. Op. 21. Dedicated to G. H. Robinson, Esq., Mus. Bac., Cantab., Organist of the Charterhouse. Price 3s. net.
8. AD CENAM AGNI PROVIDI. (The Lamb's High Banquet.) Postlude for Easter. Op. 24. Dedicated to W. S. Hoyte, Esq., Organist of All Saints', Margaret Street. Price 3s. net.
9. TE LUCIS ANTE TERMINUM. Prelude and Fugue in E flat major, for the Conclusion of a Summer Evensong. Op. 26. Dedicated to Gerard F. Cobb, Esq., M.A. Price 3s. net.
10. CORDE NATUS EX PARENTIS. A Symphonic Poem for Christmas-tide. Op. 27. Dedicated to Alfred J. Eyre, Esq., M.R.A.M., Organist of the Crystal Palace. Price 3s. net.
11. FANTASIA, IN A MINOR AND MAJOR, on Chant Themes by Jonathan Battishill. Op. 32. Dedicated to Dr. F. E. Gladstone, Prof. Royal College of Music. Price 3s. net.
12. THE ROYAL BANNERS. A Dramatic Fantasia. Op. 33. Dedicated to Walter Parratt, Esq., Mus. Bac., Oxon., Organist of St. George's Chapel, Windsor. Price 4s. net.

Of the above series, the Postlude, "Urbs Beata, Hierusalem," has been played by the Author with great success at the Crystal Palace and elsewhere, and the following are some of the many opinions which have been written of it by eminent organists, &c.:

"Many thanks for the scholarly and interesting Postlude."—Dr. John Stainer.

"I like the organ piece greatly, and wish for an opportunity to hear it on the proper instrument, when the Canto Fermo at the end of the fugue will be properly pronounced."—Sir G. A. Macfarren.

"I like the originality of the idea, and anticipate much pleasure in using the piece."—James Higgs, Esq., Mus. Bac., Oxon.

"Many thanks for your Postlude, which I like very much. It is very interesting to see how much can be evolved from such simple materials."—Charles F. Stephens, Esq.

"A most enjoyable Organ piece upon a theme I love."—Myles Birker Foster, Esq.

THE HOLY CITY

BY

ALFRED R. GAUL.

"To show the great popularity of Mr. Gaul's Cantata, 'The Holy City,' it may be mentioned that the rendering at Salford Mission Hall, on Friday last, was the forthright in Birmingham and its immediate environs since its production."—Birmingham Daily Mail.

"The work is an honour to English Art, and has elevated its composer into a place of distinction amongst native musicians."—Queen.

"A good sound musical work is this 'Holy City.' I have no hesitation in saying that it creditably represents English art, and does honour not only to the skill but to the judgment and taste of Mr. Gaul."—Daily Telegraph.

"The reception was favourable in the extreme, and the Cantata must henceforth be classed among the successes which the Birmingham Musical Festivals have brought to light."—Standard.

"The 'Holy City' is evidently the work of a thoughtful as well as a clever composer, and should make its mark among thoroughly English productions of a sacred character."—Musical Times.

"A most interesting, tuneful, and scholarly work."—Manchester Courier.

"This fine work will considerably enhance Mr. Gaul's reputation as a musician."—Liverpool Daily Courier.

Vocal Score, paper cover, 2s. 6d.; ditto, paper boards, 3s.; ditto, scarlet cloth, 4s.; Voice parts, for the use of Choral Societies, each 1s. A Selection of Soprano and Contralto Movements for School Use, ss. 3d. Band Parts on Loan. Tonic Sol-fa Edition, 1s. London: NOVELLO, EWER and Co.

VOCAL SCORE. NINTH THOUSAND.

RUTH

Music by ALFRED R. GAUL.

"Ruth" is a work of sterling power; its musical form is that of perfect usefulness combined with simplicity and strength. There is nothing involved about it, nor the least straining after unattainable effects. The composer has grasped his theme in a thoroughly sympathetic manner, and has produced a work which is worthy of the subject. . . . One of the sweetest numbers in the Cantata is Ruth's solo, 'I treat me not to leave thee,' which is instinct with pathetic expression. . . . Boaz's solo, 'Go not from hence, my daughter,' is another effective number. . . . A choral, 'Nightfall,' is an exquisitely beautiful conception; and the intermezzo, 'Daybreak,' and the jubilant Wedding Chorus which follows, are full of spirit and vivacity, rushing forward with a joyous bound that carries the audience completely away. An enthusiastic encore was given to the intermezzo and chorus."—Bradford Observer.

"That the idyllic story of Ruth is one admirably adapted for artistic illustration is unquestionable, and poets, painters, and musicians have over and over again made it a subject for the exercise of their talents, and we have no hesitation in saying that in its poetical and musical treatment by Mr. Oxenford and our townsman, it has been invested with increased interest. . . . Pieces such as Mr. Gaul's Opus 34 are much wanted, and we believe that when the 'Ruth' Cantata is heard in our Town Hall it will be at once accepted as a valuable addition to our stock of music suitable for performance by fairly advanced and advancing societies."—Birmingham Daily Gazette.

"Bright, tuneful, fresh, and musically—this work will be a great favourite, and will add to Mr. Gaul's reputation. The second part will be liked better than the first. It opens in the harvest-field, and here the real idyll begins, and with it the charm and grace and freshness of Mr. Gaul's inspiration. The maidens' chorus, bright as the morning light greets, and the men's robust and vigorous reply, well introduced, the fresh and melodious joy-breathing music of Ruth, the chastened yet hopeful address of Naomi, and the hearty generous welcome of Boaz. . . . The work closes with a short but spirited chorus, 'Rejoice, for blessings round us fall,' which will bear comparison with anything Mr. Gaul has written. An effective fugal passage carefully worked out, but not overdone, is inserted between strains of joyful acclamation of considerable freshness and vigour."—Birmingham Weekly Post.

"Ruth" has been set to music by several composers; none, however, has become so worthily popular as the Cantata under notice. Although somewhat simple in parts, it contains some charming music, and is highly characteristic of the story it so vividly illustrates."—South Wilts Express.

"Full of flowing melody."—Salisbury Times.

PERFORMED IN THE TOWN HALL, BIRMINGHAM, ON SEVEN OCCASIONS.

Vocal Score, paper cover, 2s.; paper boards, 2s. 6d.; cloth, 4s. The Chorus (only) in Vocal Score, for Musical Societies, paper cover, 1s.

TO ORGANISTS.—THE GORDON MARCH, by P. R. BARCLAY. "Original and most effective. NEW WORK.

ARRANGEMENTS for the Organ. By W. J. WESTBROOK, Mus. Doc. This work has been designed to meet the wants of those Organists who have to play organs more or less incomplete. The whole of the pieces may be played, therefore, upon organs with two keyboards; many of them, by a little management, upon organs with only one. The pedal is, of course, indispensable. It has been the aim to make all the pieces thoroughly playable, and as easy as was consistent with their due effect.

THE MUSICAL STANDARD.

"It is rare that one meets, within the compass of so modest a work as this, with such a mine of information and thought suggestive as to our Church music. . . . Mr. Curwen is endowed with the faculty of observation, and, having first secured his facts, he comments on them in a fearless and impartial manner that commands our respect. . . . There is about his work an earnestness, a broad sympathy, and a keen desire to give credit to all who are engaged in the great work of music allied to religion, no matter what are their doctrinal differences, to make us regard him as a reliable authority, and to feel that his work supplies most valuable information on a subject dear to many of us."

THE PRINCIPLES OF SINGING.

A Practical Guide for Vocalists and Teachers, with numerous Vocal Exercises, by ALBERT B. BACH, Author of "On Musical Education and Vocal Culture." Crown 8vo, 6s.

SATURDAY REVIEW.

"The work merits the highest praise that can be given, and we can heartily recommend it as a safe and practical guide to the attainment of the art of singing."

MORNING POST.

"A work whose value is unquestionable. It would be quite possible to write at length in praise of the work, especially of the excellent musical examples, and to commend its excellence in detail; but the principles are set forward so clearly and agreeably, that it is not necessary to do more than heartily recommend all who are interested in the subject to buy the book and master its contents for themselves."

ST. JAMES'S GAZETTE.

"To the student of music the book should be invaluable."

SCOTSMAN.

"The production of one who is at the same time an experienced teacher and an enthusiastic and accomplished artist. It deserves the attention of every student of singing."

LIVERPOOL COURIER.

THE SOUTH LONDON MUSICAL CLUB (founded 1875) offers a PRIZE of £10 for the best SETTING for Two Tenors and Two Basses, with free Pianoforte Accompaniment, of Words, which may be had on application to the President. A certain amount of independent part-writing is expected, and a mere part-song will be inadmissible.

The Prize will be awarded by a Committee, consisting of the President, Musical Director, Accompanist, and Hon. Secretary of the Club, assisted by the advice of Dr. Stainer.

The Compositions must be delivered, addressed to the President of the South London Musical Club, Gresham Hall, Brixton, S.W., on or before September 1, 1886.

Each Composition must be distinguished by a motto, and accompanied by a sealed envelope bearing a similar motto and containing the composer's name and address.

The Prize Composition to become the property and be published at the expense of the South London Musical Club.

Unsuccessful Competitors, whose names will not be made known, will have their Compositions returned to them.

The result of the Competition will be announced in The Musical Times of October, 1886.

Should Dr. Stainer consider that no Composition is of sufficient merit, the Prize will be withheld.

THE MADRIGAL SOCIETY offers Two Prizes, "being the 'Molneux Prize' of Ten Pounds, with the Medal, and the 'Society's Prize' of Five Pounds, for the best and second best APPROVED MADRIGALS in not less than four nor more than six parts, the upper part or parts to be for one or two Treble Voices. The character of the composition to be after the manner of the Madrigal of the 17th century, by Benet, Wilbye, Weelkes, Marenzio, and others, and to consist of independent part-writing, in figure or imitation; therefore a mere part-song or melody harmonised will be inadmissible.

The Madrigals to be delivered, addressed to the Secretary of the Madrigal Society, Woodside, Caterham, Surrey, on or before October 1, 1886, each composition having a device or motto affixed thereto, with the composer's name in a sealed envelope bearing a corresponding mark.

Mignon's song—"Knowest thou the land?"
The King of Thule.
Peace.
Clara's song.
Who never ate with tears his bread?
Wanderer's night song.
The fisherboy.
The Alpine hunter.
Once and now.

Prayer.
The Loreley.
A flower thou resemblest.
Love's marvel.
The violet.
Flower and scent.
I cherish thee.
The three gipsies.
Question and answer.
Once again I fain would meet thee.
How sweetly sings the lark.

THE MUSICAL TIMES

AND SINGING-CLASS CIRCULAR.

LISZT IN LONDON, 1886.

THE visit of a distinguished musician—pianist, conductor, and composer—after an absence of nearly half a century, has something more than the immediate surroundings of the case to invest it with interest. But when that visitor is a man like Liszt—the binding link which ties the music of to-day, not to the traditions, but to the reality of the great past—there is more reason than ever for the whole world to be “set by the ears,” and for the occasion to be turned into a time of universal rejoicing and hero-worship. That the Abbé should have yielded eventually to the solicitations of his disciples and admirers, foremost amongst whom stand Mr. A. C. Mackenzie and Mr. Walter Bache, and have come once more to these ungrateful shores, which welcomed him but coldly in the “forties,” is a matter upon which each and everyone concerned, directly or indirectly, has a right to congratulate himself. The illustrious musician has had the opportunity of finding that England is not so very inhospitable a country after all; he has seen his compositions received with boundless appreciation, and has won from the whole English people—from the Crown to the veriest plebeian—such a welcome as genius alone can command. Here, then, would be discovered the most direct refutation that we “insulars” possess neither eclecticism nor artistic appreciation, were such refutation necessary. Fortunately it is not, and Liszt will hardly hereinafter withhold from us the acknowledgment that our greeting has been sound, spontaneous, heart-whole, and thorough. Surely never before did any composer or executant enjoy such a succession of triumphs as have waited on the Abbé Liszt during his sixteen days’ sojourn in London. The record is a dazzling panorama of festivals, receptions, Royal favours, organised greetings, both public and private—in short, a never-ending array of ceremonials, in which the Hungarian virtuoso stood as the central figure. The ordinary round of musical entertainments has been pursued, notwithstanding the counter-attraction of the lion of the day; but, albeit we fortunately possess sufficient amateurs, with enough catholicity of taste to render every exhibition that is good of its kind secure of patronage, it must be felt that, so far as the heart of the nation was stirred, nothing quickened its beat but the all-absorbing and dominating presence of the famous musician. While dealing with the general aspect of his visit, it must be borne in mind that Liszt came over here more to gratify the desire and aid the ambition of the young British composer and conductor, Mr. Mackenzie, who was about to produce the Oratorio of “St. Elizabeth,” than to reap any advantage; the undertaking was undeniably prompted by the most disinterested motives, and Liszt, in quitting England, is burdened with nothing more material than the honours he has won, and the good will of the people. It was never intended that he should give any public display of those extraordinary talents which have crowned him King of the Keyboard, and though he has been frequently heard to play in private, these slight concessions to musical society are, after all, only graceful little acknowledgments of the courtesy which has been extended to him; the general public, therefore, who have followed him from concert-hall to concert-hall in hopes that at the eleventh hour the Abbé’s good nature or the force of persistent clamour would lead him to yield compliance and sit down at the instrument, have no real cause for disappointment. It was no part of his bargain, and, in our opinion, he did very rightly to abstain from playing, under the circumstances. After the extraordinary amount of fatigue, endured without the least demur, which the venerable Abbé underwent during his recent stay, there is no saying what may be the limit of his potentiality. His frame is apparently of iron; his constitution that of a giant. It is possible, therefore, that Liszt might be tempted to come again to London next season, and to make this the raison d’être for a series of Concerts or Recitals; but it would not be wise to count too implicitly upon this, considering that he has now reached five years beyond the allotted term of man’s existence—three score years and ten—and may perhaps feel less inclined again to leave the retirement of Weimar to court anew the smiles of that shallow world in which his part is well-nigh played. Still, his visit to England in 1886 will be treasured up in grateful memory by all who have the interests of progressive art at heart; while, in the exceptional instance of his playing before the students of the Royal Academy of Music, he will have left behind him such a beneficent influence as only the presence of a master-hand can exert. To the young pianists who heard him, that one solitary afternoon was worth years of tuition.

Well, Liszt has been here, and Liszt is gone. The visit has been something more than a nine days’ wonder, and is indeed so momentous an occurrence in the annals of the musical history of this country that it cannot be permitted to pass by with only such cursory remark as might have been elicited by the sudden appearance of a less brilliant luminary in the artistic firmament. For the sake of those who come after, more than for the behoof of contemporaneous readers, we propose to give a full record of the proceedings which accompanied Liszt’s triumphal entry into the English capital or took place during his stay. It is a page in the calendar to which all will turn with interest: as a manifestation of feeling, it probably is unique; as an evidence of the higher development of hero-worship it introduces us to a new departure. Never before has such a thing been known as for any individual, save a Royal personage, to be received by the audience uprising. Yet this was one of the invariable forms of public etiquette adopted when Liszt entered any public place of entertainment.

LISZT’S ARRIVAL IN LONDON

was originally fixed for Thursday, the 1st ult., but the pressing solicitations of Parisian musical circles induced him to remain to witness the repetition of his “Granter Messe” on the 2nd. Hence the time got dangerously narrowed for him to keep his appointment with the notabilities invited to meet him on Saturday, the 3rd, at Westwood House, the residence of Mr. Henry Littleton (Novello, Ewer and Co.), whose guest the Abbé was to be while he stayed in England. Messrs. A. C. Mackenzie, Alfred Littleton, Walter Bache, and Dr. Waller set off by the early mail on the morning of the 3rd to meet the master at Calais, where he was encountered in company with Madame Munkacsy, Miss Beatty-Kingston, his young pupil Herr Stavenhagen, and attendants. A fair passage was enjoyed, and the run up to town from Dover was speedily accomplished, Mr. Littleton having, by the great kindness of Mr. Forbes, the Chairman of the London, Chatham and Dover Railway, arranged that the train should not proceed straight to Victoria, but stop at Penge (in the near vicinity of Westwood House) where the little party of musicians were to alight. Some of the Hungarian residents of London were assembled on the platform, and a bouquet was presented to the Abbé, with a few graceful words of welcome, as he stepped from the train. Westwood House was reached within a few minutes of eight o'clock, and in less than half-an-hour the great virtuoso entered the commodious music-room, which by this time was thronged with all the celebrities of the musical and artistic world. There Liszt, bearing his years bravely, and conspicuous by his stature and the extraordinary profusion of snow-white hair falling in masses upon his shoulders, became the centre of attention and the object of an all-absorbing interest. This benevolent-looking, amiable, smiling patriarch was, then, the extraordinary individual whose personality had exerted for upwards of half a century so vastly dominating an influence over the fortunes of European music! This was the man who had taken Wagner by the hand when the fortunes of the latter were at their lowest, and had raised him and his art-works to positive eminence by dint of perseverance and good-fellowship. Had it not been for Liszt, the director of the Weimar Court Theatre, who can say but that the musical revolution in affairs operatic had never occurred. Only by the light of Weimar does Bayreuth become a possibility. Liszt, hale and hearty though he be, looks fully his age. Time has rounded the once stern lines in that commanding countenance; the inner strength of will is less expressed than in former years. We behold, in fact, not the champion ready to defy the world on behalf of the principles he espouses—not the proud spirit ready and eager to hurl defiance in the teeth of contending factions, but a noble old man in the vale of his years, well content to look back upon the part he has played in the world's active strife, consoled with the assurance that his efforts have not been misdirected, and wishful now for nothing better than to repose upon the laurels thus hardly won. The time of heated partisanship has passed by, the clamour of battle has ceased, and now comes the rich reward of rest.

The reception at Westwood House was unaccompanied by any set form of ceremonial. After a little while pleasantly spent in renewing old acquaintances and forming new ones, the Abbé took his place at the head of the room, and a short selection from his works was performed by Mr. Walter Bache—his enthusiastic disciple and pupil—and the representative of the Liszt element in England; Mr. Frederic Lamond, Mr. Winch, Mr. Whitney, Miss Hope Glenn, Mr. W. Coenen, &c., Liszt signifying his approval of the artists' endeavours in a most cordial manner. In this fashion, and with intervals of conversation, "the feast of reason and the flow of soul" continued until the Abbé retired for the night. The occasion was a memorable one, and will not speedily be forgotten by those privileged to be present.

A good many of the visitors had come fully prepared to hear the Abbé play, but to have urged him to do so would have been unreasonable, taking into account the fatigue of the day's journey, and the excitement of meeting old friends beneath Mr. Littleton's hospitable roof—to say nothing of the effect produced upon the nervous system by being the admired of all admirers in that enthusiastic assembly. To have seen and conversed with the distinguished virtuoso was surely gratification enough for the time.

LISZT'S FIRST PUBLIC APPEARANCE IN LONDON since his last visit, forty-five years ago, took place at the full general rehearsal of the Oratorio "St. Elizabeth" at St. James's Hall, on the afternoon of Monday, the 5th. No rumour had been circulated as to the likelihood of the Abbé attending the preparation of his work—in fact, as late as the Saturday night previous it had almost been decided that he would not go. But the public curiosity was thoroughly aflame with regard to the oratorio, which was to constitute the closing performance of the first season of Messrs. Novello's Oratorio Concerts; and as admission to the rehearsal was to be obtained at half the cost of the representation proper, there is little wonder that the room should have been crowded to the doors long before the hour announced for commencing. As the time to begin approached, anxious eyes were directed towards the upper end of the room, and when the sturdy figure of the venerable Abbé was observed advancing in company with Mr. Littleton and Mr. Bache, such a cheer went up as could have come alone from British throats. People stood on the benches to get a better sight of the art-hero; hats were wildly waved in the air, and for a time the recipient of these unexpected honours seemed fairly astounded. The members of the choir and orchestra all added their quota to the general vociferation, and it was some minutes before the cheering subsided sufficiently for Mr. Mackenzie to give the signal for the introduction to start. During the first part of the oratorio, Liszt remained seated on the front bench of the side-seats, but eventually moved to the first row immediately facing the conductor's desk, where he could communicate easily with Mr. Mackenzie or the principals. His greeting of Madame Albani and Mr. Mackenzie, at the termination of the first part, was hugely enjoyed by the spectators, who lost no possible opportunity of applauding the master with heart and voice, and were intensely gratified at seeing him bow in return. The scene at rehearsal was a sufficient earnest of what was to follow at the performance, and public interest was so powerfully stimulated that unheard of sums were offered for tickets—vainly, of course, as they had been all disposed of weeks in advance. What concerned the body of musical amateurs, and not the mere sensation-hunters, was whether the music of "St. Elizabeth" was worth all the "fuss" (to use a homely word) being made about it, and whether sufficient preparations had been made to render the performance worthy so auspicious an occasion. An unequivocal affirmative endorsed the efforts of Mr. Mackenzie and his excellently well-tutored forces, and a brilliant success was anticipated on all hands for the work when presented for critical judgment. A highly interesting episode took place during the practice of the choir at Neumeyer Hall in the evening. The Abbé had determined to go and hear how the singers got on after the arduous labours of the afternoon, and, accompanied by Mr. Alfred Littleton, he entered the room just as the choristers were going through the final number "Tu pro nobis." What followed speaks for the generosity of the man. How could he recompense all these young people for the exacting task they had undertaken solely on his account? There was but one way—to give them a taste of his quality at the pianoforte; so, without more ado he took his place at the instrument, and improvised, in the most masterly way conceivable, upon the theme which the vocalists had just relinquished, leading into his own "Ave Maria" for pianoforte solo. It was a spontaneous act, but a very gracious and memorable one. Need it be said that the Abbé was applauded until the roof rang again?

LISZT AT THE ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

The Abbé was deputed to take part in another ceremony, which can have given nothing but satisfaction to his generous instincts, the afternoon of Tuesday, the 6th, being set aside for the visit of our honoured guest to the Royal Academy of Music, there to become the practical donor of the endowment of a Liszt scholarship for young composers and pianists, the funds for which, amounting to about £1,100, had been subscribed in a very brief period, thanks to the activity of Mr. Walter Bache, Mr. C. A. Barry, and other ardent partisans of the master. Liszt must have felt his old heart beat anew with fresh kindled fervour as he witnessed the wonderful enthusiasm of the young students of the oldest English training school. He must have thought of his own pupillage—though that did not extend far into his career, seeing that he was a public performer before he was ten years old—and his eager ambition for a glorious future. Would any of these succeed as he had succeeded? Would the glorious gift of youth, fired by the wondrous light of genius, help these strugglers up to the eminence to which he had climbed?

Maybe he thought nothing of the kind, and was merely interested in seeing to what condition of capacity Sir George Macfarren's pupils had attained. But the aged Abbé had a good taste of the heartiness of youth in his greeting, and if all the R.A.M. students had been in training for a shouting medal (or a medal for shouting), they could not have deserved better of their instructors. Sir George Macfarren and the Abbé Liszt were conducted to a central position on the floor of the Concert-room, and then a little lady, Miss Ada Tunks, presented Liszt with a beautiful floral lyre, arranged in the Hungarian colours. The little lassie was not only kindly greeted by the great old master, but was kissed by him on the forehead—this kiss forming almost an equivalent, historically speaking, of that which Beethoven administered to "Master Liszt" in 1823. Professor Macfarren had obviously intended that the occasion should be rendered worthy of the event, a highly interesting programme being set before the distinguished visitor, consisting of his own Goethe Festival March; Sterndale Bennett's Caprice in E, for pianoforte and orchestra (Op. 22); Mackenzie's Concerto, for violin with orchestra (Op. 32); Liszt's Concert-study in D flat, for pianoforte; and G. A. Macfarren's Overture to "John the Baptist"—his first oratorio. Viewed by the light of other days, this scheme becomes pregnant with meaning. Nearly the whole history of the Royal Academy seems to have been unfolded to the honoured guest—Sterndale Bennett representing the student of 1826, and Principal of 1866-75; Mr. Mackenzie appearing as the King's Scholar of 1862; Sir George Macfarren representing the student of 1829, and Principal of to-day; and the conductor, Mr. William Shakespeare, figuring on the list as the King's Scholar of 1866. Thus, all that was produced before Liszt was the outcome of those who had won worthy distinction at the Academy, and were well qualified to stand up for it. Miss Dora Bright played the Caprice in very brilliant style, Miss Winifred Robinson gave a most spirited rendering of Mackenzie's exacting Violin Concerto, and Mr. Septimus Webbe gave a finished reading of the Lisztian study. It must have been a gratifying thing for M. Sain-ton to behold in Miss Robinson the executant, and Mr. A. C. Mackenzie the composer-conductor, two artists who had attained to capacity and eminence under his tutelary guidance. The young performers having been duly presented to the master, applause arose on all sides and continued for some minutes, until at last the Abbé appeared to become conscious that the students wished to hear him play. With a self-deprecatory gesture he arose, and made his way on to the platform amidst uproarious excitement. His was, indeed, literally a "flowery path," for every girl had a posie to cast at the feet of the great pianist, and every youth who sported a "button-hole" willingly offered his tribute. The consequence was that when Liszt reached the pianoforte, he found it half full of flowers—another Elizabethan basket, in fact—and had to wait some time until the strings were cleared. Then he began—with a tender caressing touch, such as no other pianoforte player ever possessed—his fingers stealing over the keys, until the melody merged in Chopin's "Chant Polonoise." The students, and audience too, were breathless with suspense until he had concluded, when a ringing cheer proclaimed how gratified all the listeners had been by so prodigious a display of subtle art. The Abbé was fain to rise from his seat, and bow repeatedly, but he good-naturedly resumed his place at the instrument, and played his own "Cantique d'Amour," sending the juvenile aspirants to the honours of the piano into the seventh heaven of delight. The short concert concluded, Sir George Macfarren came forward and addressed a few words of gracious welcome to his eminent brother-musician. It was his privilege, he said, to be able to offer the thanks of the Committee, members, and students of the Royal Academy of Music for the proud distinction the Abbé Liszt had conferred upon them all, by allowing them the great gratification of hearing him play. "You, sir, and Fame are twins," said the venerable Professor, who, continuing, reverted to the fact that Liszt had shown them that day that he had retired only when his powers were in their zenith, to pursue his calling in another direction. And this reminded the Professor of another illustrious man—our own Duke of Wellington, who, when he had no more battles to fight, proved himself as great a statesman as he had been a warrior. All honour was due to Mr. Walter Bache for having initiated the day's proceeding, and Mr. Bache, as Chairman of the Scholarship Committee, would have the pleasure of presenting the testimonial to his revered preceptor. The transfer of the envelope containing a short report on the Scholarship was anything but formal, and took but very few moments, Mr. Bache handing the enclosure to Liszt, who immediately passed it on to Sir George Macfarren—all, of course, to an accompaniment of sustained cheering. And thus the Liszt Scholarship at the Royal Academy of Music became a fait accompli.

LISZT'S "ST. ELIZABETH" AT ST. JAMES'S HALL.

One has to go back a very long way to find anything so profoundly affecting the various centres of our musical organisations as the production of Liszt's Oratorio "St. Elizabeth," at St. James's Hall, under the auspices of Messrs. Novello's Choir, with Mr. A. C. Mackenzie as conductor and prime mover of the enterprise. It could hardly have been that there was a sudden accession of admiration for the music, since that had been but indifferently received when the work was first brought before London amateurs in 1870, or when, six years afterwards, it was revived at one of Mr. Bache's annual Liszt concerts. No, the public were quite contented to take "St. Elizabeth" on trust, but their special desire was to get a sight of the renowned composer—to behold for themselves that snowy head and beaming face, whose sunny smiles were the theme of universal comment. The audience, besides being as large as the capacity of the hall permitted, was a distinguished one, their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales, the Duchess of Edinburgh, and Princess Louise being amongst the throng who attended to pay homage to the Hungarian virtuoso. The scene which ensued upon Liszt's arrival absolutely beggars description. Conceive people with their animal spirits at their highest, all shouting with one accord, and all eager to obtain a favourable view of the hero of the day, and you have it. Those who were not tall enough to see over their neighbours' shoulders got upon the seats and stood there, the example being so generally followed that soon the floor of the Concert-room presented the extraordinary and somewhat absurd spectacle of an audience standing on the benches.

It was confidently anticipated, on all hands, that this, the final performance of the opening season of the Novello Choir, would prove a crowning glory for the young society and its indefatigable conductor, who in all things, great and small, is thorough; he himself is so zealous that he commands the sympathies of his fellow-workers at the outset, thus obtaining an incalculable advantage. It is a moot question whether a life so valuable from the creative point of view ought to be sacrificed to anything but the pursuance of its highest calling; but there can be no question that Mr. Mackenzie is an admirable conductor, and, as leader of a new enterprise, is precisely the right man in the right place, since he goes into the work unfettered by galling precedents and unhampered by traditional observances. There is no need for recapitulating the copious facts concerning the Oratorio "St. Elizabeth," which have already appeared in our columns; little indeed remains for us to add beyond the mere circumstances of the performance. It must be apparent to all sentient observers that Liszt permits himself to be bound by none of the conventionalities of the scholastic form of oratorio. Sufficient ecclesiastical flavour, in his estimation, is to be gathered from the incorporation in the work—woven into its very web—of the old church theme dating back to the sixteenth century and appointed for use "In festo sanctæ Elizabeth." In fact, "St. Elizabeth," from its continuous employment of Leitmotive, may be regarded as much in the light of a manifestation of the "Music of the Future" as "Tristan and Isolde" or "Der Ring des Nibelungen." Of independent melody, truly, the score is by no means barren, and the author has brightened up the scene of the welcome of the Hungarian child-princess at the Wartburg with a singularly fresh and piquant chorus of children, "Merriest games, with thee would we play." Again, the trio to the Crusader's March is a real bit of melody; but for this Liszt is not responsible, having adapted to his use an old Pilgrims' chant, said to have been in vogue at the period of the Holy Wars. If this be true, it is one to the early Christian composers, who at all events knew how to invent tune. The recurrence of the snatch of Hungarian melody whenever Elizabeth's proud descent is alluded to, undeniably adds picturesqueness and force to the situations, and Elizabeth's prayer contains some moments of exaltation, and her dying scene is decidedly pathetic. But, on the whole, the feeling produced by the work is not that of a purely abstract composition, but a theatrical production divested of its necessary adjuncts. All the entire scene between the Landgravine, Elizabeth, and the Seneschal is essentially dramatic after the Wagnerian style of opera-drama; while the "Storm" episode, fanciful and suggestive though it may be, seems to be altogether outside the domain of oratorio, pure and simple. Few will deny, nevertheless, the existence of many evidences of thoughtful workmanship and masterly ingenuity in "St. Elizabeth," and one of its principal recommendations is to be found in the fact that the music grows upon acquaintance. For the interpretation of the oratorio no praise could be too high—it formed one of those rare occasions when criticism is completely disarmed and the language of eulogy has to take the place. The band played splendidly, the choir sang faultlessly, and the principal soloists covered themselves with glory. Madame Albani is always at her best when she undertakes a part fraught with deep religious sentiment. The fervour which she imparted into the music allotted to the saintly heroine was positively thrilling; while her rendering of the dying scene was as pure a piece of pathos as could well be imagined. No wonder that Madame Albani won golden opinions on all hands. Mr. Santley, as the Landgrave Ludwig, gave the music all the advantages of his fine voice and incomparable style; Madame Pauline Cramer displayed a very fine "dramatic" soprano voice in the part of the Landgravine; Mr. F. King did well as the Seneschal, though his was the thankless task of having to roar against the blasts of the Lisztian tempest; and smaller parts were filled by Mr. Whitney, Mr. Vaughan Edwardes, and Master Frank Peskett. A tremendous cheer went up on the conclusion of the first part, and the audience renewed their acclamations with redoubled energy, when the venerable composer was seen mounting the orchestra steps. The Prince of Wales went into the artists' room to congratulate the illustrious author, and returned to the Hall with the latter, to present him to the Princesses. When, after an eventful evening, the last chord of "St. Elizabeth" had sounded, more calls brought the Abbé on to the platform—this time led by Madame Albani—and still further cheers tended to the reappearance of Mr. Mackenzie, brought on by Liszt himself. If ever there was a fitting moment for mutual congratulation, this was the time. The record of the evening would be incomplete without the reproduction of Miss Constance Bache's happy lines of greeting to the master, printed in the book of words:—

"A MESTERNEK LISZT FERENCZNEK ISTEN HOZOTT."

We welcome thee, from southern sunnier clime,
To England's shore,
And stretch glad hands across the lapse of time
To thee once more.

Full twice two decades swiftly have rolled by Since thou wast here;
A meteor flashing through our northern sky
Thou didst appear.

Thy coming now we greet with pleasure keen
And loyal heart,
Adding tradition of what thou hast been
To what thou art.

No laurel can we weave into the crown
Long years entwine,
Nor add one honour unto the renown
Already thine:

Yet might these roses waft to thee a breath
Of memory,
Recalling thy fair Saint Elizabeth
Of Hungary.

We welcome her, from out those days of old,
In song divine,
But thee we greet a thousand thousand fold,
The song is thine!

LISZT AT WINDSOR CASTLE.

On Wednesday, the 7th, the reverend Abbé was honoured by the command of Her Majesty the Queen to wait upon her at Windsor Castle, where he had the pleasure of performing several solos in Her Majesty's presence. On the same afternoon there was a REPETITION OF "ST. ELIZABETH" AT ST. JAMES'S HALL.

under the auspices of the London Academy of Music, conducted by the principal, Dr. Henry Wylde. Dr. Wylde, it will be remembered, was the first to take cognisance of the work and to bring it under the notice of English musicians in 1870—barely three years after its original production at the Festival of the eighth centenary of the Wartburg. On the present occasion the students of the London Academy formed the choir, while the soli parts were entrusted, with a very fair measure of success, to Misses M. Macintyre and Rose Moss, Mr. Lister and Mr. Albert Reakes. Miss Macintyre, indeed, shows promise of very high excellence, and the study of the part of the heroine was throughout intelligent, refined, and effective. Mr. Albert Reakes, the possessor of a beautiful baritone voice, is to be congratulated on his method; his singing of the music assigned to the Landgrave Ludwig was in all respects excellent. Taken on the whole, the performance, which, by the bye, only extended to the first division of the work, reflected credit upon the institution. The band found an able leader in Mr. Pollitzer. Before the oratorio Miss Florence Henderson (gold medalist) gave a careful and correct reading of Liszt's Concerto in E flat. En passant, it may be observed that "St. Elizabeth" was sung in German.

LISZT AT THE GROSVENOR GALLERY,

on the evening of the 8th, when he attended the reception organised in his honour by Mr. Walter Bache, was indeed a personality to be remembered. Mr. Bache, entering heart and soul into his task—as he always does whenever Liszt is concerned—had invited all the most prominent members of London musical society, with the result that a more brilliant, distinguished, or intellectual gathering could hardly have been assembled under one roof. As there was hardly any set form of observance, the proceedings partaking wholly of the nature of a friendly soirée, it is not necessary to dwell on details, beyond saying that a short programme was performed, consisting of Liszt's "Angelus" for stringed instruments, played by a capital band of our leading instrumentalists; the "Chor der Engel" from the second part of Goethe's "Faust," sung by students of the Royal Academy of Music, Mr. Shakespeare conducting, and Messrs. Wingham, Westlake, and Lockwood furnishing the accompaniments; the "Benediction de Dieu dans la Solitude," for pianoforte, performed by Mr. Walter Bache; together with songs from Schiller's "Tell," declaimed by Mr. W. Winch. Warmly received as were all these excerpts from the repertory of a great producer, the applause sank into insignificance before that which greeted the aged musician as, after bowing profoundly to the enthusiastic company, he made his way to the pianoforte, where he played firstly an arrangement of Schubert's four-hand "Divertissement Hongroise," and a section of his Hungarian Rhapsody in A. Once more the witchery of his skill charmed the instrument into the utterance of tones producible by no other fingers but his own; and once more was the full tribute of homage and appreciation laid at his feet.

LISZT'S BUST

has been modelled, life size, by the celebrated sculptor, Mr. Boehm, to whom the Abbé gave sittings on such occasions as he could manage to steal from his manifold engagements. The work will be exhibited at the Grosvenor Gallery during the present and following months. On Friday evening, the 9th, a

LISZT CONCERT AT ST. JAMES'S HALL

was given by Chev. Leonard E. Bach. At this entertainment the illustrious Abbé had signified his intention of appearing, and the consequence was naturally a large and eager audience. The selection comprised Liszt's E flat Concerto, Fantasia Hongroise, and Grand Polonaise (d'après Weber)—all for pianoforte and orchestra—played with considerable effect by the Concert-giver; the orchestral episode from "Christus," "The Three Holy Kings," and "Orpheus" symphonic poem, Uhland's song "Die Vätergruft," scored for this Concert by the composer, and other songs, safely placed in the charge of Mr. and Mrs. Henschel and Miss Liza Lehmann—a daughter of the well-known artist, Rudolf Lehmann, and a vocalist of the utmost promise. Between the parts Liszt was enthusiastically called to the orchestra, whence he bowed his acknowledgments. Mr. Randegger conducted. Subsequently, by desire of H.R.H. the Prince of Wales, the Abbé attended the last given by special desire in Prince's Hall. Being a semi-private gathering, the details of the performance need not detain us; suffice it to say that the selection comprised Beethoven's "Leonora" (No. 3) Overture; solos for violin by Liszt and Nachèz, rendered by M. Tivadar Nachèz; Rossini's gorgeous "Semiramide" Overture, pianoforte pieces by Henselt and Liszt, interpreted by M. Vladimir de Pachmann; Gounod's "Marche Religieuse"; and Liszt's first Hungarian Rhapsody. The vocalists were Mr. Barrington Foote and Mr. Ben Davies, Mr. George Mount conducting. The "lion" of the evening, who sat beside H.R.H. the Prince of Wales, was obviously pleased at the entertainment provided, joining lustily in the general applause. The audience throughout the evening had been on the tiptoe of expectation, thinking that the principal guest might have been tempted to play, but there was no intention upon his part to break through his general reserve, and so the amateurs went hungry away. It was, however, altogether a very jovial and pleasant gathering, and the Abbé showed himself thoroughly smoke-proof.

Probably one of the most memorable and notable episodes of the sojourn in London was the admirable

arranged by Mr. August Manns, for the afternoon of Saturday, the 10th. The composer promised to be present to assist at the début of his favourite young pupil, Herr Stavenhagen, and altogether the entertainment was provocative of much popular curiosity. The programme, to a large extent, speaks for itself. Of course it "goes without saying" that all the works performed were the compositions of the Hungarian master. This was the scheme:—

Rakoczy March.
Symphonic Poem, No. 3, in C major—"Les Preludes," after Lamartine.
Ballade—"Die Lorelei."

(Miss Liza Lehmann.)

Concerto for Pianoforte and Orchestra—No. 1, in E flat.

(Pianoforte—Herr Bernhard Stavenhagen. His first appearance.)

Symphonic Poem—"Mazeppa," after Victor Hugo.

Songs—{"Es muss ein Wunderbares sein."

Songs—{"Angiolin dal biondo crin."

(Miss Liza Lehmann.)

Solos for Pianoforte {"Liebestraum," No. 1, in A flat.

{Fantasie Dramatique sur "Les Huguenots."

(Herr Bernhard Stavenhagen.)
Hungarian Rhapsody, No. 4, in D minor and G major.

Nothing better than this selection could have been devised to exhibit the talents of the musician in his creative capacity, each phase of his artistic mannerism being represented. It is rather hard to reconcile the fact that the author of such gems of beauty as the "Lorelei" ballad, and the quaint little lied, "Angiolin dal biondo crin," and the very mystical orchestral "Poem" "Les Preludes," are one and the same individual. Whether Liszt, in his symphonic poems, by making music the handmaiden of poetry, and relegating it to a subservient position, is fulfilling the ideal of artistic fitness, is a matter which will inevitably form food for the discussion of the adherents of the old school and the new. Enough is said, however, for the immediate purpose, in admitting that the composer has certainly furnished some very striking tone-pictures in "Les Preludes" and "Mazeppa," the force and energy of which cannot but be generally admitted. In his transcription of the famous Hungarian "Rakoczy" March, Liszt has hardly been so happy in his orchestration as Berlioz; but the warlike, soul-stirring (to the Magyar) melody is presented in an attractive form, and the material is wrought up into so-called symphonic shape. It appears that Liszt anticipated Berlioz in setting the national tune to orchestral purposes; but when he heard of his fellow-artist's intention of arranging the theme, he generously withdrew his own arrangement, and, during the French master's lifetime, would neither permit it to be published nor given to the world in any way. It was not until Berlioz had passed away that he consented to its publication in 1871. The programme books contain a very masterly disquisition upon Liszt's Symphonic Poems (à propos to "Les Preludes"), from the pen of Mr. C. A. Barry, in which the vexed question of classical form, and the method adopted by the Hungarian Abbé is nicely ventilated. For the benefit of those amateurs who have not yet dived into the depths of the matter, we quote what Mr. Barry has to say in defence of the new school:—"A comparison of the established form of the so-called classical period with that devised by Liszt . . . The former may be described as consisting of (1) the exposition of the principal subjects; (2) their development; and (3) their recapitulation. For this Liszt has substituted (1) exposition; (2) development; and (3) further development; or, as Wagner has tersely explained it, 'nothing else but that which is demanded by the subject and its expressible development.' Thus, though from sheer necessity, rigid formality has been sacrificed to truthfulness, unity and consistency are as fully maintained as upon the old system; but, by a different method, the reasonableness of which cannot be disputed." In the interpretation of the several works, Mr. Manns's splendid orchestra surpassed itself; the players, to a man, were thoroughly on their mettle, determined to let the Abbé know what an English orchestra could do, and the result was a magnificent performance. Even Liszt himself could but acknowledge this, and, from his place in the front row of seats, immediately beneath the conductor's desk, he more than once rose to shake Mr. Manns cordially by the hand, and to bow to the audience, whose cheers and applause reverberated throughout the enclosed area. Herr Stavenhagen made a very successful first appearance, and bids fair to become a highly popular artist. He has profited ably by his mentor's instructions, and in his delicate manipulation of scale passages and gruppetti comes closer to his model than any other pianist with whom we are acquainted. This is high praise, but it is deserved. Herr Stavenhagen also has plenty of muscular power, but this, wisely, is kept in reserve as much as possible. The Concerto made an undeniable effect, and the young executant was loudly called back to the platform—where also, in response to continuous vociferations, the master himself appeared. It was rather a pity that Herr Stavenhagen chose the elaborate and lengthy fantasia on the "Huguenots," in addition to the "Liebestraum," for his second solo, since it unduly prolonged an entertainment which was already much more extended than usual. The Concert over, there was a repetition of the noisy demonstration in Liszt's favour, and he must have found it no easy matter to escape from the somewhat too pressing attentions of his admirers.

After this, it might be supposed that Liszt would have been left in peace for the remainder of the day; but no, the mercurial Abbé was speedily off again Londonwards to assist at a RECEPTION AT THE GERMAN ATHENÆUM.

All the more distinguished members of the club were in attendance, and after a short programme of Liszt's music had been disposed of, the master seated himself at the piano, to the emphatic delight of his fellow convives, and played his arrangement of Schubert's "Frühlingsglaube" and Weber's "Memento Capriccioso."

The following day, Sunday, did not find the Abbé any the worse for his previous exertions. On the contrary, he was prepared for a day of extra fatigue. Early in the morning he left Sydenham to attend service at the Brompton Oratory, remaining afterwards to hear a special selection of organ music; in the afternoon he was the centre of an enthusiastic gathering at the residence of the well known littérateur and amateur, Mr. W. Beatty-Kingston, where he astonished and gratified his audience by improvising in the manner in which he is simply unapproachable. In the evening he was due at Marlborough House, where he had the honour of dining with the Prince and Princess of Wales, after which he was heard upon his favourite instrument.

A HUNGARIAN RECEPTION,

in honour of our illustrious visitor, was arranged for Monday afternoon, the 12th, at the town residence of Dr. Duka (President of the Hungarian Association of London), Nevern Square, Earl's Court, when there were present amongst the host of the invited the Duke of Teck, the Austrian Ambassador, the Netherlands Minister, the Portuguese Minister, M^{de}. d'Antas, the Countess de Bylandt, &c. It was altogether an opportunity to get rid of superfluous patriotism and to wax enthusiastic over the presence of the great Hungarian artist, who of course could not deny his compatriots the same gratification which he had already extended to his entertainers. His playing was listened to with almost greedy satisfaction. Later on the Abbé made his way to where his countryman and brother virtuoso, Joseph Joachim, was "leading" at the last performance but one of the season. The programme—all from Beethoven—comprised the first of the Rasoumowsky Quartets in F, and the Kreutzer Sonata, wherein Herr Joachim was associated with Mr. Charles Hallé. Mr. Hallé also played the Sonata in A flat (Op. 110) in a manner which called forth the complimentary approbation of his eminent auditor. As usual, Liszt was received with Royal honours on entering the Concert-room, and was obviously regarded as quite as much a part of the entertainment as the music itself.

On Tuesday, the 13th, the Abbé lunched with the Baroness Burdett-Coutts, and the following evening witnessed the ninety-ninth representation of "Faust" at the Lyceum Theatre. Mr. Henry Irving graciously placed the Royal box at the disposal of Liszt and his party—which included Mr. and Mrs. Littleton, Mr. and Mrs. A. C. Mackenzie, Madame Munkacsy, Mr. W. Bache and Miss Constance Bache, and Herr Stavenhagen—and the performance was keenly enjoyed, notably by the principal guest of the evening, who had little or no difficulty in following Mr. W. G. Wills's version of the famous original. The theatre was darkened when the Abbé and his retinue arrived, so that he was not at first observed, but at the fall of the act drop, when the lights were turned up, the conspicuous figure of the white-haired musician became the cynosure of all eyes, and a ringing cheer brought forth responsive salutations. After the performance Liszt supped with Mr. Irving in the old club room of the Beefsteak Club—a place of extraordinary traditions, with which, it is to be hoped, the master was duly regaled, as well as with creature comforts.

On Thursday afternoon, as will be found notified elsewhere, Liszt was present at

MR. FREDERIC LAMOND'S FOURTH RECITAL

at St. James's Hall, while on Friday evening he presided at the

at Prince's Hall. There was a numerous, though not an overflowing audience, the number of amateurs who had been hanging on to the heels of the Abbé during the previous ten days in hopes of witnessing a gratuitous exhibition of his exceptional powers evidently having cooled down in their ardour. Nevertheless, there were plenty present to greet the musician with perfect English good-will and heartiness, and to give a cordial welcome to the young pianist, whose abilities were put to the test for the first time in central London. We have already spoken of Herr Stavenhagen as a very accomplished player; indeed, for a very young man, he seems to be almost phenomenally good. But while the excellence of his method is at once to be recognised, the misfortune of appearing only as an expositor of Liszt's music prevents any accurate judgment being formed as to his calibre as an artist. The selection embraced the "Funérailles" in F minor, from the "Harmonies Poétiques et Religieuses"; Spozializio in E major, from the "Années de Pèlerinage"; Grand Fantasia and Fugue in B flat major, on the name of Bach; "Legendes" in A and E major—(a) "La Predication aux Oiseaux"; and (b) "St. François marchant sur les flots"; Etudes in G sharp minor and E flat (after Paganini); Sonnetto di Petrarca in A flat; and Grande Fantasia sur "Les Huguenots," in B, specially rearranged by the composer for this Concert. Herr Stavenhagen obtained every possible encouragement from his hearers, and may be assured of a high place in our esteem whenever he thinks fit to revisit our shores.

"ST. ELIZABETH" AT THE CRYSTAL PALACE.

The overwhelming success of the production of "St. Elizabeth" by the Novello Choir, at St. James's Hall, led the Crystal Palace executive to reconsider their preconcerted arrangements for the final Saturday Concert of the season, the 17th, and to substitute the Hungarian composer's oratorio for Beethoven's Choral Symphony. The alteration was in all respects dictated by wisdom. There was the Novello Choir, ready to hand; there was Mr. Mackenzie, also ready to hand, to conduct the performance. Small wonder then that Mr. Manns vacated the conductor's chair in favour of the popular North Briton, while Beethoven was deposited for the nonce to make room for Liszt. Into the details of the performance it is by no means necessary to enter, inasmuch as the principals were the same that took part in the St. James's Hall representation—Madame Albani, Mdlle. Pauline Cramer, Messrs. Peskett, Vaughan Edwardes, Whitney, King, and Santley—and that the work was given under the same auspices as before.

The concert-room was crowded in every part, and standing room would have been willingly paid for. The grand old composer was present, as usual, and doubtless was highly flattered by the encomiums lavishly bestowed on all hands. No element of an artistic triumph was lacking, and the public enthusiasm was, to all account, perfectly spontaneous and genuine. Of course there were calls for the author, and equally as a matter of course, he mounted the orchestral steps, and made his obeisance from the platform. Be sure, also, that while all this enthusiasm was flying about, Mr. Mackenzie was not forgotten. The choir sang admirably, and the orchestral playing left nothing for the most fastidious taste to desire.

At the conclusion of the luncheon which preceded the Concert, to which Liszt was invited by the Crystal Palace Directors, Mr. B. L. Moseley, on behalf of the Committee, presented the Abbé with a "Valedictory Address," from the London Branch of the United Richard Wagner Society.

LISZT'S FINAL APPEARANCE IN LONDON

took place on the afternoon of Monday, the 19th, on the occasion of a Concert given at Prince's Hall by the Countess Sadowska—a lady and an artist new to London, as far as our experience extends. Only the compositions of the Hungarian musician were performed, but this was strictly in accordance with the eternal fitness of things. Messrs. Willem Coenen, Buziau, and Hollmann played Saint-Saëns's chamber arrangement of the "Orpheus" Symphonic Poem; Mr. Coenen and his clever young pupil, Miss Shaw, of Brighton, gave an effective rendering of the two-piano version of Weber's "Polonaise Brillante"; Mr. Hollmann and Mr. Coenen contributed violoncello and pianoforte solos respectively; and the Countess Sadowska, Mdlle. Marie de Lido, and Mr. Arthur Oswald supplied the vocal music. Miss Shaw had the honour of being presented to the Abbé, who spoke a few sentences of congratulation and encouragement which will be, no doubt, treasured up by the young lady amongst her happiest reminiscences. At the end of the Concert, Mr. Charles Fry, the well-known elocutionist, came forward and delivered a specially written for the occasion by Mr. W. Beatty-Kington. The address appears in the current number of The Theatre magazine. The lines were listened to with the most sympathetic attention, and at the end there was one of the usual eruptions of popular sentiment. And thus did the grand old figure of the Abbé—humanitarian, executant, author, and composer—pass out of the public life of the year 1886!

Liszt left for Antwerp, via Dover, by the morning mail on Tuesday, the 20th, attended to the station (Herne Hill) by his hospitable entertainers, Mr. and Mrs. Littleton, and other members of the family. Amongst those present to bid the illustrious master "Farewell, and God speed," were Messrs. Walter Bache, A. C. Mackenzie, and Dr. Duka. As a parting souvenir, Mrs. Littleton presented her late guest with a splendid bouquet of Marechal Niel roses and lilies of the valley. On arriving at Dover, Liszt was presented with an address by the Mayor, and a bouquet by the Mayor's daughter. Messrs. Alfred and Augustus Littleton accompanied the Abbé as far as Calais, where they left him and his companion de voyage, Herr Stavenhagen, with reciprocal protestations of amity and good-will.

The year 1886 will long be remembered by the lustre thrown upon it by the presence of a truly great man, the most imposing figure in the musical world, not only of to-day, but for a generation past. And now that he has tested the warmth of English feeling, we can only express the hope—wherein we but re-echo the wish of thousands—that he may be long spared to put our friendliness again and again to the proof. We welcomed him with pleasure; we part with unfeigned regret from

FRANZ LISZT.

LISZT SCHOLARSHIP.

ENGLAND, if not actually rich in the number of her endowed Musical Scholarships, bids fair to become so at no distant period. During the last three years their number has been greatly increased by the opening of the Royal College of Music,* which at the present moment has in its gift no less than fifty open and eight close Scholarships, providing free musical education during three or more years. Fifteen of the former and all the latter also carry with them free maintenance in the way of board and lodging during term time. The Royal Academy of Music† at present has at its disposal eighteen Scholarships, Exhibitions, or Prizes, as they are variously termed, ranging in value from a silver medal to three years' free education in the Academy. Partaking for the most part of a memorial character, they are to be regarded rather as prizes than as Scholarships, properly so called. But their number, or more strictly speaking, their value, will be greatly increased when the late Sir Michael Costa's munificent bequest falls in. This consists of (1) a Scholarship of £120 per annum, enabling the recipient to pursue his studies upon the Continent, and tenable for five years; and (2) two Scholarships of £40 per annum each, for students in the Academy, also tenable for five years. The first of these will be the most valuable Musical Student's Prize that we possess, and will doubtless attract many students to the Royal Academy in hope of winning it. Of a similar nature to this is the "Mendelssohn" Scholarship, which also permits of the holder of it prosecuting his studies abroad. It owes its existence principally to the efforts of Madame Goldschmidt-Lind, and its value is about £80 per annum.

But for what precise end these Scholarships, which owe their existence to private liberality or to public subscription, have been founded, does not seem to be very clear. The question therefore suggests itself: Were they founded solely for the benefit of the recipients of them, or do their founders look for a return in the way of specially good work, composition, &c. ? If the latter be the case, it is much to be feared that Scholarships which include both education and maintenance must, to a great extent, fail in their aim. Such Scholarships would probably, in many instances, be given to indigent persons, who, at the close of their academical career, would be let loose upon the world with no other aim than to maintain a living for themselves among the already over-stocked rank and file of teachers. To look for a return from such persons, unless another three years' maintenance can be provided them, seems perfectly hopeless. For however promising as a composer, or however good as an executant a young man may be, it is manifestly impossible that at the outset of his career he can make a decent living either by composing or by playing in public. He must resort to the drudgery of teaching, and give up all hopes of becoming either a great composer or a virtuoso. It is satisfactory, therefore, to learn that at the Royal College of Music it is intended to found Fellowships, some of which will be for the purpose of enabling students at the close of the collegiate course to further prosecute their studies abroad. This, however, is a plan which is still under discussion and has not yet been matured. But in the meantime several of the three years' Scholarships, which have recently terminated and have been held by students who promise especially well as composers, have been renewed for a further period.

The plan of enabling a musical student, who has been thoroughly well grounded at home, to gain further experience by continuing his studies abroad—we will not say to completing them, for a musician's studies should never come to an end—seems to be the very thing we most stand in need of. In saying this we cast no reflection upon the best of our musical educational institutions, both national and private. It is not that better teaching is to be got at collegiate institutions abroad than in England, though the academical terms there are longer, and the vacations shorter than with us; but that the opportunities afforded by a year or two spent on the Continent, in acquiring a foreign language, which is said "to make a man twice a man," in freeing oneself from the home-groove, and thus gaining experience and independence, as well as a knowledge of how musical matters are regarded abroad, are advantages which cannot be too highly estimated.

It was with some such feelings as these that the Committee of the Liszt Scholarship Fund, who, without any appeal to the general public, have within a few weeks collected from among their friends the sum of £1,100 for the endowment of a Liszt Scholarship at the Royal Academy of Music, as a memorial of Liszt's recent visit to England, resolved, on handing over this sum to trustees, for the benefit of students of this institution, to attach to it the condition that, when the fund has been sufficiently augmented by further donations, one of its aims shall be to enable students of the Royal Academy of Music to partly prosecute their studies abroad.

For the furtherance of this desirable scheme, donations to the Liszt Scholarship Fund may be paid to the Honorary Treasurer, Mr. Alfred Littleton, 1, Berners Street, W.

THE GREAT COMPOSERS

BY JOSEPH BENNETT.

SCHUBERT, as we have seen, gained little by official testimonials. The friendship and good offices of the Sonnleithner family were of far more service to him, by affording a direct means of bringing his works into contact with an influential section of the public. Dr. Sonnleithner, the head of the household in question, was a lawyer of cultivated artistic tastes, which he gratified by gathering under his roof from time to time the best artists present in Vienna. The meetings began in May, 1815, and continued till February, 1824. They were held every Friday evening during the summer months and once a fortnight during the winter, attaining eventually so great a reputation that a desire to attend them became wide-spread and rather embarrassing. On these occasions Schubert's music was largely performed; the "Erl-King," amongst other works, being first heard at a Sonnleithner gathering, where it was sung by an amateur named Gymnich. That famous inspiration made a deep impression, as well it might have done, and was the means of enabling Schubert to see himself in print. The younger Sonnleithner went, first of all, to some of the great publishing houses in Vienna, such as those of Diabelli and Haslinger, offering them the MSS. of Schubert's collected songs for a trifle. But no one would take them even as a gift. The commercial eye could see nothing but the works of an unknown man who wrote difficult accompaniments, and the commercial mind declined to do business. Under these circumstances a few friends clubbed together; the pieces were engraved at their expense, and at Sonnleithner's next gathering a hundred copies were subscribed for. So great, indeed, was the success of this enterprise that the composer paid all his debts and was left with a round sum in hand. His good fortune did not end here. In March, 1821, the influence of the Sonnleithners secured places for three of his pieces in the programme of a public concert. One of these was the "Erl-King." It took the audience by storm, was encored amid tumultuous applause and then, let us add, Diabelli was glad enough to buy it. Schubert's "Geisterchor" had a different reception at the hands of the same audience, who, by asserting strict impartiality, enhanced the value of their judgment upon the "Erl-King." Kreissle says of this fiasco: "The singers, impressed with the majestic character of the work, expected to be vehemently applauded, but there was an ominous silence and the eight victims on the altar of musical insensibility withdrew in confusion from the scene, looking very much as if shivering from the effects of a cold douche suddenly poured over their heads." They shivered again, perhaps, on reading a criticism which appeared in the Allgemeine Musik Zeitung: "The eight-part chorus, by Herr Schubert, was recognised by the public as a farrago of all sorts of musical modulations and vague departures from ordinary forms—no sense, no order, no meaning. The composer in this work resembles a waggoner, who drives a team of eight horses, and turns now to the right, now to the left, getting at one time off the road, then upsetting, and pursuing this game without once making any honest way." Schubert could afford all this in the flush of the success made by his songs, but he does not seem to have been turned aside by either praise or blame from his careless, laissez faire habits. He left his friends to manage business matters on his behalf, and could be absolutely depended upon to assist them in nothing. There is an extant letter from one of the Sonnleithners which throws a strong light upon the composer's happy-go-lucky nature:—

"I beg you to take particular care and see that Schubert comes to-morrow to Frl. Linhardt, to rehearse with her 'Der Jungling,' which she sings with me; and afterwards, that Schubert comes to me on Wednesday, at half-past twelve o'clock, to try over his 'Geisterchor.' I count on your good services to get Schubert to be certain and attend these rehearsals. I must honestly confess my surprise that he never comes near me, as I am very anxious to speak to him about his 'Erl-König' and other matters."

Had Schubert been so disposed he might, at this time, have taken a place in the high society of Vienna, by the side of Beethoven. But an invincible shyness, a sense of discomfort arising from unfamiliar and restraining surroundings, and the promptings of a nature which found its highest social good among free and easy friends—these things kept the composer back, with fatal effect to his worldly prospects. "He himself," writes Kreissle, "never expressed a wish to mix in society, where he was forced to get rid of his innate shyness, reticence, and a good natured non-chalant manner, but could not escape yielding occasionally to friendly pressure put upon him. The number, however, of the families in Vienna to which he, either from artistic reasons or the feelings of true friendship, was drawn into close relations for any length of time was, comparatively speaking, very small."

We have referred to Schubert's delight in a small circle of free and easy friends; very few of whom, by the way, were musical. Only two professional musicians—Anselm Hüttenbrenner and Franz Lachner—formed part of the circle, the rest were poets, philosophers, artists, and others who delighted in indulging the native freedom of intellectual humanity. Certain gatherings of this confraternity were dubbed

"Schubertiaden," and at them, we are told, "games were played, dances danced, speeches made, but Schubert's compositions formed the staple of the entertainment, and more particularly the last new songs from his pen." Besides these Schubertiaden, the composer's friends joined in country parties and picnics, at which the flowing bowl was filled more often than prudence counselled. A high spirited, rollicking set were these young Viennese. They had few social scruples, and Schubert, who should have been sustaining the dignity of his art before the world, loved to dance, sing, and drink with the best, or worst, of them.

The year (1821) during which the foregoing events happened was not the most prolific of Schubert's life. It produced some additional music to Hérold's "Clochette"—a German version of that work being presented at the Court Theatre. A number of the master's finest songs were also written in 1821, but his chief effort was made in the sketch of the Symphony in E. As this sketch throws a valuable light upon Schubert's mode of working we offer no apology for transcribing Sir George Grove's interesting description of it:—

"It occupies 167 pages of 42 sheets (10 quires of 4 and one of 2), and is in the usual movements—Adagio in E minor and Allegro in E major; Andante in A; Scherzo in C and Trio in A; Allegro giusto in E major. The Introduction and a portion of the Allegro are fully scored and marked, but at the 110th bar—the end of a page—Schubert appears to have grown impatient of this regular proceeding, and from that point to the end of the work, has made merely memoranda. But these memoranda are in their way perfectly complete and orderly to the end of the Finale. Every bar is drawn in, the tempi and names of the instruments are fully written at the beginning of each movement, the nuances are all marked, the very double bars and flourishes are gravely added at the end of the sections, and Fine at the conclusion of the whole; and Schubert evidently regarded the work as no less complete on the paper than it was in his mind. And complete it virtually is, for each subject is given at full length, with a bit of bass, or accompaniment figure, or fugato passage. There is not a bar from beginning to end that does not contain the part of one or more instruments: at all crucial places the scoring is much fuller, and it would, no doubt, be possible to complete it as Schubert intended. It is said that Mendelssohn contemplated doing so; but this is probably a mere legend, and Mendelssohn was too practical to give his time to a work which, at the best, could only be regarded as a curiosity."

We may add that Sir Arthur Sullivan is credited with having at least thought of filling in the skeleton score, and that what Mendelssohn and Sullivan declined to do has since been accomplished by Mr. J. F. Barnett, whose version of the work obtained a hearing at the Crystal Palace and much praise for its cleverness.

Another important work was entered upon, but not completed, in 1821. We refer to the opera "Alfonso and Estrella," which first took form in Schubert's mind during an autumn holiday spent with his friend and librettist Schober, at the castle of Ochsenburg. The subjoined letter from Schober throws an interesting light upon the circumstances and experiences of the two friends in their Styrian retreat, as also upon the progress of the opera:—

"Schubert and I have returned from our visit, and look back with delight upon a happy month spent partly in the town, partly in the country. At Ochsenburg we had plenty to do in visiting the beautiful country in the neighbourhood, and in St. Pölten books and concerts absorbed our attention; spite of all this we both worked hard, Schubert especially—he has done nearly two acts, I am upon the last. I only wished you had been with us and witnessed the birth of those lovely melodies; the wealth and vigorous outpour of Schubert's fancy is really extraordinary. Our room at St. Pölten was exceedingly nice—two big beds, a sofa, and a good fireplace, not to mention a grand piano, gave it a very snug home appearance. Of an evening we always compared notes of what had passed during the day, we sent for beer, smoked our pipes, and read aloud. Perhaps Sofie or Netta would join us, then we had singing. Two 'Schubertiaden' were held at the bishop's house, and one at Baron Mink's, a favourite of mine, and a princess, two countesses, and three baronesses were present, all of whom were delighted in the most approved aristocratic fashion."

The letter then becomes uninteresting to readers at the present day, but Schubert himself adds a postscript in which he says, referring to a dedication of some songs to the Patriarch Ladislaus Pyrkar and Count Friess:—

"I must now inform you that my dedications have done their duty, for the Patriarch, at the instance of Vogl, has expended twelve ducats, and Friess twenty, a fact which suits me extremely well. . . . Schöber's opera has already got to the third act, and I should much like you to have been present whilst the opera was in its earliest stage of formation. We count a great deal upon the work in question."

Yet nothing came of it; it was not even performed till Franz Liszt produced the work at Weimar in 1854.

Going on into the year 1822—twenty-sixth of the master's life—we find "Alfonso and Estrella" completed on February 27. As just stated, it did the composer little good. The libretto wanted dramatic strength, and the music was difficult—so said the managers in refusing to have anything to do with it. But the opera brought Schubert and Weber together, with something of a collision at first. The North-German composer had come to Vienna (1823) for the purpose of producing his "Euryanthe," which Schubert heard, and somewhat freely criticised, declaring himself ready to prove, even to Weber, that the opera did not contain a single original melody. When it was remarked that music had entered upon a new phase, and Weber sought effects from heavy masses, Schubert retorted: "What good are heavy masses? 'Der Freischütz' was so genial, so full of heart, it bewitched you with its loveliness, but in 'Euryanthe' very little geniality can be found." Tale-bearers at once carried these remarks to Weber, who contemptuously observed: "Let the blockhead learn something first before he presumes to judge me." This was turning the tables with a vengeance. Blockhead quotha! Schubert could not stand that, so, taking the score of "Alfonso and Estrella" under his arm, he started for Weber's lodgings to "have it out." Weber looked through the blockhead's work, and then twitted its composer with his harsh criticisms upon "Euryanthe." Schubert stuck to his guns like a man, and Weber fired back, referring to "Alfonso and Estrella": "I tell you that the usual course is for people to drown the first puppies and the first operas." Thus the two men could not agree, but they had no personal quarrel, and Weber even thought of producing Schubert's work in Dresden.

About this time our master had his first interview with Beethoven—that is to say, if Schindler's "Life" may be credited, in which we read:—

"In the year 1822, Franz Schubert set out to present in person the master he honoured so highly with his Variations on a French song (Op. 10). These Variations he had previously dedicated to Beethoven. In spite of Diabelli accompanying him, and acting as spokesman and interpreter of Schubert's feelings, Schubert played a part in the interview which was anything but pleasant to him. His courage, which he managed to retain up to the very threshold of the house, forsook him entirely at the first glimpse he caught of the majestic artist, and when Beethoven expressed a wish that Schubert should write the answers to his questions, he felt as if his hands were tied and fettered. Beethoven ran through the presentation copy, and stumbled on some inaccuracy of harmony. He then, in the kindest manner, drew the young man's attention to the fault, adding that the fault was no deadly sin. Meantime, the result of this remark, intended to be kind, was utterly to disconcert the nervous visitor. It was not until he got outside the house that Schubert recovered his equanimity, and rebuked himself unsparingly. This was his first and last meeting with Beethoven, for he never again had the courage to face him."

It curiously exemplifies the historian's difficulty in getting at the truth that doubt is thrown upon Schindler's very circumstantial statement. Sir George Grove is a believer in it, but Dr. Kreissle seems to be among the doubters, and speaks of its "rather improbable details, so humiliating to Schubert." He then goes on: "It should be stated that a gentleman still living in Vienna, an intimate and trusted friend of Schubert's (Herr Josef Hüttenbrenner), shortly after the presentation of his musical work, heard from Schubert's own mouth that he certainly visited Beethoven, but that he was not at home, and that Schubert entrusted his Variations to the care of the housemaid or man servant, and consequently that at that time he neither saw nor spoke to Beethoven. Hüttenbrenner adds that Schubert subsequently heard with great pleasure of Beethoven's enjoying these Variations, and playing them frequently and gladly with his nephew Carl." Who is to decide when high authorities thus positively contradict each other? We, at any rate, shall not presume to do so, but may point out that there is nothing at all improbable in Schindler's statement. With regard to the relationship, or non-relationship, between Schubert and Beethoven, it is well to consider one important fact, which, with our present estimate of the younger master, is naturally overlooked. We must not forget that Schubert was to Beethoven as a small star to the noon-day sun, both in his own eyes and in those of the public. It signifies nothing what he was in reality, or what he is now in the world's opinion. At the time of which we speak the two men were separated by a great gulf, and when Schubert looked at Beethoven he did so across an immense intervening space. Who, therefore, is surprised to find the small man approaching the great one—the awful ideal of his worship—with trepidation, increased by natural shyness and self-mistrust? To our mind the behaviour of Schubert, as Schindler describes it, is just what might have been expected by any one knowing the young composer, and the circumstances of the case. As for his conduct being "humiliating," two opinions are possible. We may regret that Schubert did not take full advantage of a rare opportunity, but, depend upon it, his nervous confusion lowered him not a whit in Beethoven's eyes, as cool self-assurance might easily have done.

While on this subject, it may be well to anticipate the course of our history, and present further statements of fact in relation thereto. Rochlitz visited Vienna in the summer of 1822 to see Beethoven on business, and in one of his letters he mentions Schubert thus:—"A fortnight afterwards (after his first interview with Beethoven) I was just going to dinner, when a young composer, Franz Schubert, an enthusiastic worshipper of Beethoven's, met me. Beethoven had spoken to him about me. 'If you want to see him cheerful and unconstrained,' said Schubert, 'You ought to dine in the same room with him at the Gasthaus where he always goes to dine.' He brought me to the house. The places were mostly taken; Beethoven sat surrounded by several of his friends, who were perfect strangers to me." If Beethoven spoke to Schubert about Rochlitz it is clear that they must have met, probably on the occasion described by Schindler. But it was in the last days of Beethoven's life that the greatest of masters became acquainted, through his works, with the young composer destined so soon to follow him to the grave. On this matter we read in Schindler:—

"I laid before him (Beethoven) a collection of Schubert's Lieder and vocal pieces, about sixty in number, and several of them at that time in manuscript. I did this not merely with the view of entertaining him, but of giving him an opportunity of fathoming Schubert, of forming a more favourable opinion of his gifts, which were regarded with suspicion and distrust by many eccentric persons who treated in the same manner others of their contemporaries. The great master, who, up to this time, knew but three or four songs by Schubert, was astonished at their number and could not believe that before that time (Feb. 1827) Schubert had written over five hundred. But if he was astonished at the number, his wonder was at its height when he examined the contents. For several days he could not tear himself away from perusing them, and he pored for hours daily over 'Iphigenie,' 'Allmacht,' 'Junge Nonne,' 'Viola,' the Müller Lieder, and others. He exclaimed repeatedly in a voice of rapturous delight, 'Certainly, a god-like spark dwells in Schubert.' 'Had I had this poem, I too would have set it to music.' He could not say enough of most of the other poems and Schubert's original method of handling them. . . . In short, the esteem which Beethoven felt for Schubert was so great that he wished to see his operas and pianoforte works; his illness, however, had so undermined his constitution that he could not gratify this wish."

It says much for the liberality of Beethoven's mind, that on his death bed, he studied the works of men so diverse as Handel and Schubert, saying of the one "He is the master of us all," and recognising in the other the divine spark of genius.

According to Hüttenbrenner, who closed Beethoven's eyes in their last sleep, Schubert was once admitted to the sick master's room. Kreissle says, repeating Hüttenbrenner's words: "They (Schubert and the painter, Teltscher) stood a long time by the bed of the dying man. Beethoven, who had been beforehand informed as to his visitors, fixed his motionless eyes upon them, and made signs with his hand, which they failed to interpret. Schubert, most deeply moved, then left the room, with his companion." Let us here add that Schubert was one of the thirty-eight torch bearers at Beethoven's funeral, and that on returning into town from the cemetery, he and some friends drank each two glasses of wine, one to the dead man's memory, another to the first of the company who should follow him. The first was Schubert himself.

Our master's productions in the year 1822, were, as usual, numerous. Among them were the two movements of the Unfinished Symphony in B minor—a first and glorious extension to orchestral music of the profound feeling and great originality shown in his songs and pianoforte works. Numerous Lieder bear this year's date; and the Mass in A flat received at this time the finishing touches. Moreover, the publication of Schubert's works went briskly on, quite a competition for his MSS. presenting a marked contrast to the time when Haslinger and Diabelli refused the "Erl-King." But the poor composer, shiftless as usual, fared badly at the hands of the sharp business men who amassed wealth with the products of his brain. Vainly did his friends intervene; giving him good counsel, and even bargaining with the publishers in his stead. After his careless happy-go-lucky fashion, he would accept offers which upset all their calculations. Among other silly acts, he sold to Diabelli for 800 florins a set of songs, of which one, "The Wanderer," brought 27,000 florins within a year of publication. Among Schubert's friends Hüttenbrenner was conspicuous in pushing his interests with the publishers of North Germany. He applied to Peters, of Leipzig, amongst others, and there is extant a long letter from the head of that firm in which he laboriously tries to reason himself into a position where moral sense approves his saying "No." All that Peters would do then (look at his Schubert catalogue now!) was expressed in the following paragraph:—"I would therefore propose that Herr Schubert should send me for examination some of his works he intends for publication, for I print nothing of a young and little-known composer without having seen it. If some great and well-known master does anything bad, the blame falls upon him, for his name is my surety; but supposing I publish anything of a new artist, and it turns out unsuccessful, I am blamed; for who forces me to print anything of the worth of which I am not persuaded in my own mind. Now, in this case, the name of the composer affords me no protection. Without doubt, Herr Schubert entrusts his works to perfectly safe keeping; he is assured against any possible abuse of trust. If I like them, I will retain all that I can."

So on, and on, through a wordy epistle which led to nothing at all; but, all the same, had Schubert acted with ordinary prudence, he might have laid the foundation of a competency. He had the ear of the Austrian public; his works sold well, and a fair proportion of the profit would have lifted him above the reach of poverty. We now close our record of the year 1822 with mention of the fact that Schubert, about this time, refused one appointment, and was denied another. Through Vogl, Count Dietrichstein, the Director of the Court music, offered Schubert the post of organist at the Imperial Chapel. It was rejected. Our master, confined in his irregular way of life, could not bear to contemplate the regular discharge of duty. He preferred a "crust of bread and liberty," even to the honourable servitude of a Court Organist. The place denied him was that of viola player in the orchestra of the Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde—a sufficiently humble office which, however, could not be his, for the reason that professional musicians were not eligible as members of the Society.

At this juncture in our master's life we pause. We now see him before the world; no longer writing songs for the delectation of a few private friends, and composing larger works with no purpose save that of gratifying an irrepressible impulse. He is a recognised composer at last. He has struggled out of darkness into light, and if he only go the right way to work, may reach fame and fortune together. But we know that this is not to be. A few more years of incessant labour, of thankless living under a cloud of poverty, of the "hope deferred which maketh the heart sick," and the drama of Schubert's life will be played to the end without a trace of the "poetic justice" which fancy invents to compensate for the harsh decrees of Fate. Yet Schubert had the talent of success if, as Longfellow says, it be "nothing more than doing what you can do well, and doing well whatever you do, without a thought of fame." Thus Schubert acted. He sowed seed to spring up and bear fruit a hundred-fold after his death, to the end of a deathless renown.

By F. CORDER.

V.

13. "Music to Goethe's Faust." First and Second Parts. By Edouard Lassen.

To take up this score after the other is like emerging from a railway tunnel into the open country; the one work so strange and unapproachable, the other so crystal clear and genial. It is true that Goethe's drama, especially the second part, seems to want music of a somewhat mystic and misty character, in which case we must accuse Lassen of being too simple and "tunny." But this music is composed for use in the theatre, and experience shows that purely melodramatic music is effective in direct proportion to its simplicity. Effective Lassen's music certainly is, full of bold character and charming melody. But the author belongs rather to the class of Raff and Rubinstein than Schumann and Brahms; that is, his music has hardly the depth and refinement demanded in an accompaniment to "Faust." It was composed for the Goethe Festival at Weimar in 1876, where Lassen was Conductor. Lassen was born in Copenhagen in 1830, was brought up and educated in Brussels, and has since 1859 been Liszt's successor at Weimar. He was one of the first who produced "Tristan und Isolde," he has written many beautiful songs and much dramatic music; his technical attainments are of the highest order, his orchestration superlatively good, but there is just a trifling something lacking which keeps him out of the front rank. In Germany there are at least a dozen composers just like him, so the fault may be a lack of distinct originality. But his music has all the melodic boldness of Raff, coupled with the refinement of the Jensen and Kirchner school, yet without the effeminate chromatic weakness of these latter. This "Faust" music contains sixty-three numbers in all, varying in length from the four bars of fanfare for trumpets and drums which usher in the characters of the stage-prologue to the long musical scenes of the two Walpurgis nights and the Epilogue. Lassen, as a modern composer, has naturally adopted the principle of Leitmotiv to some extent, as indeed every composer of melodramatic music always has done. Therefore, the theme of the Archangels' trio in the Prologue in Heaven:—

may be expected to recur not only in the Epilogue, but also at the end of the first part, when Gretchen dies. There is a slightly vulgar motive for Mephistopheles—

a resumption of the Archangels' trio. An orchestral introduction to Act I. follows, founded on the Faust motive, a pregnant phrase, somewhat suggesting Liszt in its third bar—and the Easter Hymn must certainly claim to be the best setting extant. The principal theme is a bold swinging melody in unison with an unchanging bass accompaniment, and a bell sounding on the fourth beat of each bar. The Prelude to Act II, with its contrapuntal working of a bustling, chattering theme in semiquavers, gives all the idea of the crowds of holiday-makers outside the town-gate. The Beggars' song is capital, the Soldiers' chorus has the swing of a Schubert march, while the Peasants' dance is a most charming Ländler. Faust's vision and the Chorus of Sylphs, with bouche fermée effect, is not free from a suspicion of vulgarity, but is highly melodious. Why was this not used at the Lyceum? The Auerbach's cellar scene is a complete success. The songs of the revellers are all unaccompanied, the couplet "Uns ist ganz cannibalisch wohl als wie fünfhundert Sauen," being set as a capital round or canon in four parts, while Mephistopheles' "Song of the Flea" has a tune that ought to win it an encore. The scene in the Witches' kitchen is highly grotesque, a phrase very suggestive of the mewing of cats pervading the music of the cat-apes. Gretchen's "Song of the King of Thule" is charmingly quaint and simple, and is written low, and in small compass, so as to be sung by an actress without much singing voice. A portion of it is sung in the Lyceum version, the only piece from Lassen utilised. The whole of the music might easily and advantageously have been taken from this one source, instead of so many incongruous works. There is naturally but little music for the garden scene, but the principal piece of melodrame typifying Gretchen, and in the last bars Faust also, is very striking—

Lento espressivo.

In Faust's soliloquy among the woods and rocks the Spirit motif recurs with good effect. Mephistopheles' serenade is quite as good melodically as Berlioz's setting, and not so clap-trap. The Walpurgis night scene has splendid wild music, very long and elaborate, in the midst of which the Gretchen motif appears and calls Faust back to his better self. In the prison scene the music is necessarily made subordinate to the action, but the few concluding bars bring in the Heaven and Gretchen themes very effectively.

Just as the second part of "Faust" must be a disappointment on the stage, so Lassen's music to it seems to be too materialistic and gross for our sense of fitness. The Ariad scene is not striking, the Imperial march and Carnival music are appropriate enough to the situation, but there seems a lack of poetry. The melodramatic music, when Faust and Mephistopheles speak of the Mothers, is more grotesque than weird and impressive—

The classical Walpurgis night music, however, is very picturesque. Helen of Troy has a curious pastoral-sounding motiv which hardly seems appropriate—

(Accomp. throughout.)

This theme is used as an accompaniment to the chorus of Trojan captives. Faust here enters with the Gretchen motiv transformed into a triumphal march. The Euphorion scene is beautiful, but we do not understand why at his death the Mothers' theme re-appears. A wild and furious Bacchanalian dance concludes this act. We must give a passing word of admiration to the little orchestral nocturne which opens Act 5. The concluding numbers are not of much musical importance, being subordinated to the stage-action; the Angels' chorus seems rather common-place, and as the Epilogue can hardly be represented on the stage the composer does not get much chance with that noble lyric situation. The Chorus Mysticus is made as short as possible and of course introduces the Gretchen motiv. On the whole this is by far the clearest and most attractive music to Goethe's play with which we are acquainted, always excepting the Schumann third part, which stands so far removed from all other music as to challenge no sort of comparison.

14 and 15. These two sets of songs from Goethe's "Faust" (1st part) are similar in scope, and not unlike in character. Neither of the composers is much known in England, nor do their names appear in "Grove's Dictionary," though both have had some reputation as song-writers in Germany. The nine songs by Leopold Lenz are in two sets, the first consisting of Gretchen's songs, including two settings of the Spinning-wheel song; the second part has the lyrics for male voices, such as the Rat and Flea songs, the Serenade, &c. Lecerf's settings include two speeches of Faust's, not meant for music—"Ihr naht euch wieder, schwankende Gestalten," and "Verlassen hab'ich Feld und Auen." This collection is comprehensively dedicated "with gratitude and respect to the immortal poet, and likewise to the by-Art-and-love-of-Art-eminant admirers of his genius, the most august Prince of Radziwill and Herr Professor Zelter." This dedication reminds one of Mark Twain's to John Smith, the writer of which argued that as the man to whom a book is dedicated always buys at least one copy, he should by this means gain "a princely affluence." Certainly of all the innumerable settings of separate lyrics in "Faust," but two stand out prominently as complete successes, these are Schubert's immortal "Gretchen at the spinning-wheel" and Liszt's picturesque "King of Thule." This latter is, however, like all its composer's songs, less a mere setting of the poem than a beautiful rhapsody for piano and voice, suggested by the words and glorifying them. It may be questioned by some whether this course is artistically defensible in dealing with a pure ballad.

Class III. cannot be dealt with in such detail as Class II., for many reasons. Some of the works are too familiar to need analysis, while others are absolutely unknown. Raimondi's opera (16) belongs to the latter class. It may, however, be as well to remind our readers that its composer was a great man in his day (1786-1853), and a composer of a fertility and science almost bewildering to think upon. We have seen an Overture of his for two orchestras in canon (in the possession of the late Ferd. v. Hiller), and he wrote quantities of fugues, of which four or five might be played together, a serious opera and a comic opera, which could be similarly combined, and more than all, three oratorios, "Potiphar," "Pharaoh," and "Jacob," which were first played separately, and then all at once under the name of "Joseph." This piece of almost incredible ingenuity took four years incessant toil to write, and produced such an impression on its first performance, that the poor composer fainted, and never recovered the effects of his emotion. Surely in this land of Oratorio it might be worth while to revive this sensational production of a hopelessly bygone musician!

17. "Faust," Opera in Five Acts. By L. A. Bertin. Louise Angélique Bertin—or Bertini—was a French singer, pianist, and composer. She was born in 1805, and died in 1877. Her compositions are said to show "evidences of genius, though full of crudities, owing to her imperfect musical education." But why did she have an imperfect musical education, or rather, why did she under such circumstances inflict her crudities upon the world? We have only seen the final prison scene of her "Faust," and trust sincerely that the remainder of this and her other operas remain in MS. This single specimen of her powers consists of a series of conventional Italian cantabile strains in the style of Bellini, obviously written by a prima donna, and joined, or separated, by padding of the most dire description, in which the "imperfect musical education" is but too evident. Had Mlle. Bertin lived in London at the present day she might have made a fortune as a writer of Royalty ballads, but fate has spared us the infliction. She is dead and her music too. Peace to their ashes!

18. "Faust," Opera Comique. By A. Ph. de Pellaert.

Of this work we can glean no particulars. Augustin Philippe Baron de Pellaert was rather a curious specimen of the amateur. He was born at Bruges on March 12, 1793, and was of good family. His father was for some time chamberlain to Napoleon. The young man was brought up for the army, but, having artistic tastes, he divided his time between fighting, painting, music, and literature. He wrote eleven operas, mostly to his own librettos, nine dramas, painted upwards of 700 pictures, and distinguished himself moreover in his nominal profession. His "Faust" was produced at Brussels in 1834 "with great success" (like every opera), but does not seem to have been published.

19. "La Damnation de Faust." Légende Dramatique. Hector Berlioz.

What shall we say of this work? Where indeed is the use of saying anything? It is now well known to the London musical public; it is genuinely admired and extolled as a work of the highest genius. That the impression it produces on a first hearing is profound, it would be folly to deny; and yet—and yet we must in honesty confess that many portions, certainly not all, seem to us tainted with that artificiality and bombast which renders the greater portion of Berlioz's compositions a dead letter. Berlioz, to us, seems always to think, "What new combination of instruments shall I have here? What tone-colour shall come next?" and indeed, his own words show that he thought of little else in music but inventing new orchestral effects. Of the music which these effects were to clothe and colour he seemed to take much less account, and it must be confessed that on paper even "Faust," the best of his works, seems laboured and dull. We admit that we have no business to judge it on paper, but one cannot help thinking that a great work, even a "tone-poem," ought to bear translation without complete loss of its charms. But, waiving this point, for, as we have said, the work in question is now beyond the pale of criticism, we have another serious "bone to pick" with Berlioz and with his English critics. In all our list of more than thirty versions of "Faust" there is not one in which the grand old story has been so shamefully ill-treated, even by the brutal hand of the burlesque-writer, as in this. Such a libretto ought to have caused the work to be mercilessly derided by any audience acquainted with Goethe's play, and overwhelmed with scorn by all critics with any pretensions to high literary taste. Singular to state, its preposterousness has been almost ignored in England, though it has certainly prevented the work from taking root in Germany. That Berlioz, the cultivated and accomplished writer who professed to revere Goethe and adore Shakespeare, could perpetrate such a literary outrage is almost beyond belief. He has calmly taken all the principal lyrics and lyric situations in Goethe's play, strung them together with the recklessness and irreverence of a composer of drawing-room fantasias, making absolute hash of his own work in order to introduce incongruous musical pieces of effect, such as the Rakoczy March and the Hell-ride, and has produced a libretto before which the critic stands (or ought to stand) utterly aghast. Even the good folks of Paris, though unmoved by the sacrilege to Goethe, remonstrated against the imbecility of Faust's compact and beguilement by Mephistopheles; and that Berlioz could gravely defend his work and argue that the fiend's behaviour was only in keeping with the character of the Father of Lies, is only accountable when we remember that he was a man who was perpetually making himself ridiculous yet never entertaining the least suspicion of the fact. While our hand is in for finding fault with this wayward genius, we may be permitted to point out that the celebrated "Amen" chorus, which has been so extolled for its ironic humour, is an uncommonly bad fugue, and engenders the suspicion that Berlioz, like many modern composers of less talent, cast ridicule upon the contrapuntal style because he himself had never succeeded in mastering it. And, in fact, Berlioz's forte is certainly not counterpoint.

20. Of Gounod's "Faust" there is naturally little to be said. We may remark that the libretto, founded on Carré's melodrama, if it gives little of the spirit of Goethe, is yet admirable as a drama and beyond praise as an opera book. The Walpurgis Night scene is not likely to be performed in England, at least until the copyright (which M. Gounod still holds) expires, and though the ballet airs are very charming, we can well spare it. The opera seems more refined and poetic without it.

22. "Mefistofele." Opera. By Arrigo Boito.

This curious compound of crudity and cleverness, of brilliance and bathos, of poetry and vulgarity, is very hard to criticise, as one hardly knows on what level to place it. As to the libretto Boito did well to put as a motto to the title page Der Herr's question "T'è noto Faust?" for certainly no one who has not read the whole of Goethe's play can make head or tail of it. After disposing of the first part of the poem in his first three acts, the fourth takes us, without why or wherefore, to Arcadia and the classical "Walpurgis Night." No one knows who Helena is, or where she comes from, the tangle being only made worse by her being always played by the representative of Marguerite. Then in the last act Faust is back again in his study, and has grown old again—another mystification for the general public—and looks like old Father Christmas, as the angels shower down what are meant for roseleaves over him as he dies. If such libretti as those of Berlioz and Boito are the outcome of a reverence for Goethe, we can only say that we prefer the irreverence of Barbier and Carré. As to the music, it is generally admired, but we cannot help picking a few holes in it. The opening prelude, for example, with its would-be solemn trumpet calls, seems like nothing so much as a burlesque of Wagner, while the scherzos for the Cherubin and Mephistopheles are in odd taste, to say the least. The "Kermesse" music is terribly vulgar, only fit for a circus, while Marguerite's opening lines in the Garden scene, "Cavaliero illustre e saggio," are sung to a melody positively identical with a tune of Offenbach's. In the more poetic parts, Boito, like most Italian and French musicians, has sometimes gone out of his depth, and in striving to imitate the harmonic subtleties of the German school, has only produced monstrosities. Take, for instance, the horrible progression of chords at the opening and end of the fourth act, or the following, which commences the last act—

No. 24. Andante.

This seems like a crude imitation of the famous opening of Gounod's opera. But in the one case the composer knows what he is about, and in the other he—well, it strikes us, that he doesn't.

NICOLO PAGANINI AND HIS GUARNERIUS

A REMINISCENCE OF GENOA

By ED. HERON-ALLEN.

In the early part of the year of grace 1885 it was my privilege to wander throughout the length and breadth of Italy in the capacity of Special Commissioner of the Music Section of the International Inventions Exhibition, the object of my visit being the collection of Historic Musical Instruments from public and private museums, for the Loan Exhibition of Ancient Musical Property which occupied the gallery of the Albert Hall. To speak, however briefly, of one-third of the musical and other artistic treasures which, jealously guarded from the vulgar gaze, were daily exposed for my inspection by the art-loving Italians, would take me far beyond the limits necessarily prescribed to such an essay as the present one, so I confine myself to presenting my readers with a few observations which it has been the privilege of very few mortals to have had the opportunity of making. The end of the month of March found me installed at Genoa, in the Hotel Isotta, on the Via Roma, which rears its dazzling perspective of lights every evening from the Piazza Carlo Felice to meet those of the ever-rising Via Azarotti.

My deeply preconsidered object in visiting Genoa was to attempt the Heracleian feat of borrowing from the Municipality the matchless Guarnerius Violin, the subject of this monograph, a feat which had already been unsuccessfully attempted by many a musical ambassador from every court of Europe; this masterpiece of the Cremonese Violin maker having remained hermetically enclosed in a glass case, shielded from the fingers of the profane and vulgar (with the exception of the occasions mentioned below) ever since, in accordance with the bequest of Nicolo Paganini, it was deposited in the Municipio by his son, the Baron Achille Paganini, in the month of July, 1851. How it came about that I succeeded in breaking through the Medic and Persaic regulations which surround this Historic Violin, and was enabled to subject the instrument to the minutest examination, it is my present purpose to relate.

Accompanied by Mr. Montague Yeats Brown, Her Majesty's Consul-General, I had visited many of the municipal officials, and had hazarded what to them must have been my impious suggestion, and one and all had shaken their heads and pitied my temerity with true Italian and official gravity. I therefore commenced operations by going, as a mere stranger might go, to see the violin itself, explaining the object of my quest to a beadle, before whom Solomon in all his glory would have been quietly and tastefully attired. I was taken upstairs to a large ante-room (the Sala del Consiglio), where with bated breath and awe-struck voice my guide commenced pointing out the magnificent Venetian Mosaics of Christopher Columbus and Marco Polo. He could not understand that his two great fellow-citizens were nothing to me in my capacity of fiddler, and that his third co-townsmen, Nicolo Paganini, was everything. When it dawned upon him that I was not pleased to remain in contemplation of the memorials of his adventurous compatriots, he led me into the Sala Rossa, and at length, opening a cupboard in one corner of the room, he ejaculated the "Ecco lo qua" that I had so patiently waited to hear, and the Guarnerius upon which Paganini woke the echoes of the fame which reverberated to the uttermost parts of the earth stood before me.

The Palazzo del Municipio, built by Rocco Lurago and Giacomo Carlone in 1556, for the Doria Tursi family, with its stupendous wings and vast courtyard, contains nearly all that the Genoese hold to be most sacred. Here are preserved the magnificent frescoes of Piola, brought hither on the destruction of the church of St. Sebastiano, and here the Genoese stand with awe-stricken faces amid the monuments of their historic glory. I think they hardly can realise that it is without a thought for all these that European musicians flock to their city to gaze in mute adoration upon what is perhaps the greatest, the most justly renowned, instrument that ever left the fingers of the Cremonese master-workman. In vain my cicerone called my attention to the bâton of the celebrated conductor Angelo Mariani, the bronze tablets inscribed with Genoese historical records, and the sword of the General Nino Bixio. At last, irritated beyond endurance, with the irritation which one feels at the man who makes feeble jokes, and tells irreverent and irrelevant anecdotes in Westminster Abbey or St. Paul's, I turned upon my well-informed field-marshal and asked him how they dared put such rubbish in the same cupboard with the violin of Paganini. He looked at me "petrified with amazement," and then shrugged his shoulders once more. I was evidently mad—or English!

The violin stands beneath a glass case, upon which the light, striking the curved surface from an adjacent window, creates a dazzling iridescence which entirely interferes with a close inspection of the instrument beneath; add to this a lyre-shaped "holder" and a large pad of white satin which completely hides half the lower portion of the instrument, and the obstacles to a good view of the fiddle are complete. The effect, indeed, is such that the only published photograph of the fiddle is entirely illusory, save as a reminiscence of the general coup d'œil. By the side of the padded alcove wherein the fiddle in its crystal veil is ensconced is hung a portrait in miniature of the great violinist; it is probably modern, for the face is idealised after the manner of all the modern portraits of Paganini. On the wall, beside the cupboard, is an oil painting of the virtuoso, presented to the Municipality in 1869 by the Cavaliere G. Isola, which is evidently taken from life, and which bears that fawn-like and weirdly goatish look which was the Maestro's leading characteristic, but which successive artists have done their utmost to soften down and do away with.* On a shelf below the Violin reposes its red leather case, on the lid of which is stamped in plain gold letters "NICOLÒ PAGANINI," and which I reverently opened; it is lined with red plush and contains a second bow of inferior quality, whilst in the end pocket remains a packet of coiled strings secured by the Municipal seals. I gazed long upon these relics, and upon the fiddle, and as I gazed my mind was made up, I would have that fiddle in my own hands and play upon it or I would die. I fully realised the difficulties of the feat, but what obstacles can be erected by one man that another cannot remove? Now as to the great virtuoso himself.

Nicolo Paganini was born in Genoa, February 18, 1784. His father, Antonio Paganini, who was connected with the shipping interest of that city, was an ardent musician, and, we are told, a skilled performer on the mandolin. From the first he resolved that Nicolo should become a professional violinist, and a story is told of Madame Paganini having dreamt that an angel promised her that her son should become the greatest violinist in the world; whether this was a pia fraus or not, it is certain that from the earliest possible age the prince of violinists received the training adapted to the profession in which he afterwards so far outstripped all virtuosi who have appeared before or since. The enthusiasm, or it may be the cupidity, of Antonio Paganini was such that the early years of Nicolo's life were spent in one long labour over the technical difficulties of his instrument, and though he was an infant prodigy at six, wrote his first sonata at eight, and made a brilliant public appearance at nine, it is hardly to be wondered at that young Paganini threw off the parental yoke at the earliest possible date, and confronted the wide world as an artist on his own account. His first master was Servetto, a violinist at the theatre, his second Costa, the Cappell-Meister of the Cathedral of St. Lorenzo, his third, Rolla. Schottky† tells us that Paganini having gone for lessons to Rolla (who was the leader of the orchestra at Parma), the latter being in bed ill, young Paganini began trying over a Concerto of Rolla which he found on the table in an ante-room, whereupon the composer declared himself unable to teach him anything more than he knew already, and referred him to Paër. This is incorrect; there is no doubt that Paganini was for some months a pupil of Rolla,* taking at the same time lessons in harmony from Ghiretti, who was the master of Paër. Paganini made his first fuore with a Fantasia upon the Carmagnole,† and in 1797 undertook a musical tour with his father. It was after this that, having with difficulty obtained leave to attend the Fête of St. Martin at Lucca, and having tasted there the sweets of freedom and flattery, he cut himself adrift from his father's control and undertook a tour on his own account, during which the dissipation which he indulged in, with all the vigour of an uneducated mind, continually reduced him to the greatest want: he was but fifteen. Que voulez vous? On one occasion at Leghorn he had to sell his violin to pay his debts, and as he was in despair for a fiddle to play upon at his Concert, M. Livron, a French merchant, and amateur of the violin, lent him a superb instrument of Guarnerius with which to fulfil his engagement. At the close of the Concert, on Paganini's returning the instrument to its owner, the latter exclaimed, "Je me garderai bien de profaner des cordes que vos doigts ont touchées; c'est à vous maintenant que mon violon appartient." This instrument never left him, and it is the identical fiddle which we are discussing, at this moment enshrined beneath its glass dome in the Sala Rossa of the Municipio at Genoa. It was in a manner somewhat similar to this that Paganini became possessed of his other violin, a matchless Stradivari, erstwhile the property of the painter Pacini. The latter defied Paganini to play at sight an intensely difficult manuscript Concerto, laying down his own violin as the reward of accomplishment of the feat; whereupon our hero, remarking calmly "If that is so, bid farewell to your fiddle," went through the piece without a fault.

* The published portraits of Paganini are simply innumerable. Many of them, like George Cruikshank's, and that one by Doré, engraved in Blanche Roosevelt's fascinating work, "Life and Reminiscences of G. Doré" (London, 1885; p. 111), are nothing more than caricatures, but among the better class I may quote those of W. P. Sherlock, E. Snell, E. C. Corplett, H. Gerard-Fontallard, R. Hamerton, and W. Fraunquet, all of which I have before me, and which are more or less idealised, not to mention the grotesque but in the possession of Professor Ella, the portrait by Gauci upon the "Paganini Quadrilles," the one upon Guhr's transcription of "Le Streghe," and caricatures such as those outside Leoni Lee's song "The Wonderful Paganini;" or, London Fiddling Mad," and the "Paganini-Labelle" duet.

From this time till 1804 Nicolo Paganini went through some of the most exciting and various experiences which it is given to artists to undergo. In 1805, being then twenty-one years old, he made a fresh tour round Italy, which was terminated by his acceptance of the post of director of the Chamber Music of Princess Eliza, sister of Napoleon Bonaparte, and wife of Prince Bacciocchi of Lucca and Piombino, with the grade of Captain of the Royal Bodyguard. In 1808 he left Lucca, and after playing at various cities of Italy, settled down at Turin, where his health first began to give way. He never recovered it, but was to his last day subject to attacks of internal inflammation, which often seriously interfered with his professional engagements. In 1809 he visited the Court (which had moved from Lucca to Florence) for a short time, and the celebrated bust of Paganini by Bartolini was made at this epoch. He returned to his duties at Florence from time to time till 1813, meanwhile making short tours around Italy, playing here and there as caprice moved him. In 1813, considering himself slighted by the Princess Eliza, he left her service, never to return. During the years which followed, our virtuoso was continually obliged to decline challenges, which were offered him by various artists, to play in the same concert with them—in fact, to engage in a species of musical duello. Only once did he yield to such a defiance. This was in answer to the repeated prayers of the violinist Lafont. Speaking of this event afterwards, Paganini remarked, "Lafont probably surpassed me in tone, but the applause which followed my efforts convinced me that I did not suffer by comparison." A similar rivalry was supposed to exist between him and Lipinski, a Pole, who subsequently became leader of the violins in the Chapel of the King of Saxony. During these years Paganini's life was one protracted concert-tour. He remained in Venice for over a year (1816-17). In 1817 we hear of him at Rome, and in 1819 at Naples. In 1820 he was taking a leading part in the musical world of Milan, in the following year he returned to Naples, and so on, from town to town, his triumphal progress continued, culminating with a brilliant season in Rome, during which he was, by Pope Leo XII., decorated with the Order of the Golden Spur.

In the year 1828, Paganini made his first foreign tour, visiting Vienna, and thence making an exhaustive tour round all the German states, arriving at last in Paris, where he gave his first concert in the Opera House, on the 9th March, 1831. The month of May saw him in London, where the sensation created by his performances, exceeding that which has ever before or since greeted the appearance of an instrumentalist, is still within the memory of some of us now living. He returned to Italy after six years, a man of independent fortune and world-wide renown, to be worshipped by his justly proud compatriots, and in the years 1834-5 we hear of him only at rare intervals playing for charitable institutions, or at the concerts of indigent artists. In 1836 the fatal vice of his youth—gambling—seems to have returned to him, for he allowed himself to be made a party to a gambling speculation—the construction of a Casino, called by his name—which, proving a disastrous failure, cost him 50,000 francs, and such health as remained to him. In 1839, shattered in health, and poor by comparison with his former opulence, he removed to Marseilles, and thence an irresistible yearning to return to his native place took him back to Genoa, whence in the month of October he fled for Nice, to find there—not, alas! health, but death. On the 27th day of May, 1840, Nicolo Paganini died. Giancarlo Conestabile has described his death to us in beautiful and touching words in his "Vita di Nicolo Paganini" (Perugia, 1851).

Such was Nicolo Paganini, the owner of the priceless Guarnerius, the story of the acquisition of which by him I have given above, the testator to whom the municipality of Genoa owes its right to keep for ever out of harm's way the violin whose tones have taken a million souls by storm. I have said that I determined to examine and play upon this instrument. I compassed the fulfilment of my desire in the following manner:—

Early on the morning of the day following that on which I had paid my "personally conducted" visit to the divine Guarnerius, I waited upon the civic authorities, and after an hour of the circumlocution and inter-postal communication which forms the inevitable overture to an interview with an Italian Sindaco, I succeeded in obtaining an audience of the Baron Podesta, Syndic of the city of Genoa. This gentleman received me with every expression of esteem and respect, and was désolé that he was obliged to return to me the same answer that he had been obliged to return to King Humbert on the occasion of the Milan Exhibition—namely, that by the terms of Paganini's will, the instrument could not leave the Municipio; however, after exhausting all my ordinary

† The Carmagnole was the name of a rabid Jacobin song, much in vogue at the time of the Montagnards (1793). It took its name from the Carmagnole, or shirt worn by the members of the Jacobin Club, and was sung to the old tune. "Malbrunk s'en va-t'en guerre." Thiers' "History of the French Revolution." arguments, I was about to leave him, when the spirit prompted me to unmask my last battery, and, like "Pedgift's Postscript," I turned upon him with the authority of a great Name. Il Sindaco bowed, and saying how sorry he was not to be able to accord "la chose capitale," placed the violin at my disposal (under careful supervision) for the day. To write the necessary official letter, to engage a photographer, and lay in a stock of writing materials were the work of three minutes, and a procession formed itself to go and take the fiddle from its case. The procession consisted of—first, two gorgeous beadies, then the present writer, and behind him Signor Giovanni de Simoni (Capo Ufficio del Civico Economato), and Signor Gaetano Corsi (Vice-Segretario del Municipio). The procession advanced through the Sala del Consiglio through a crowd which parted right and left for us, into the Sala Rossa, where my first visit had been paid. But what a change! The whilom deserted room was lined with gaily dressed people, a triangular table stood in the middle with four arm chairs in front of it, and one large one behind it. As "our procession" entered the room an official girt in a civic scarf motioned me towards one of the arm-chairs. Ciel! the horrible situation burst upon me like a flash of lightning—it was a civic wedding going on, and they took me for the bridegroom. Never did harmless commissioner find himself in so ghastly a predicament, and never did he so narrowly escape an awful calamity. The necessary explanations ensued, and the society which had doubtless been relieved by this slight divertimento, relapsed into the normal condition of wedding-day boredom. The "procession" having taken the violin, case and all, from the cupboard, retired in the same order in which it had advanced, reinforced by a third larger and more gorgeous beadie who carried the Paganini violin. Arrived in a third room, where my photographer was awaiting us, the seals of the glass case were solemnly broken, the case was opened, and the fiddle, for the first time since the death of Paganini, was placed in the hands of a stranger.

The instrument was made over to the civic authorities on December 2, 1850, and was sealed up in its present case in July, 1851, as above mentioned. Since then it has been out of its case for various purposes four times—on March 17, 1868; on June 9, 1875; on January 18, 1877; and on November 6, 1882. It has only once been heard in public, and that was when it was confided to Camillo Sivori, Paganini's favourite pupil, who played upon it at a reception at the Duc d'Aosta's. The operations of examining the fiddle and taking its photo occupied about three hours, and I am inclined to regard them as some of the most privileged moments of my life. All the time the officials sat and glared at me, horrified, no doubt, at the idea that their fiddle should be touched by the hands of the impious alien, whilst two clerks drew up a procès-verbal of the proceedings, which we all subsequently solemnly signed.

The violin is of the grandest pattern of Joseph Guarnerius del Jesu, and bears the date 1742. The general tone of the varnish is dark red, and it is much worn on the side of the tailpiece where the virtuoso's chin clasped it; the wood also at the edge of the incurved side nearest the E string is much worn away by the rapid action of the bow in high passages. A similar, but not so accentuated, wear is found on the opposite side nearest the G string, whilst a curious deep groove is worn right into the wood all along the right hand side of the finger-board. The wear is also very marked to the right of the neck, where the hand is placed in the high positions. The bridge, which I am assured is the original one, is rather low, plainly cut, and with remarkably small and thin feet. The glorious quality of the varnish of this unique instrument is best seen by looking at the sides, which are in a fine state of preservation save at the bottom and at the right of the neck, where the varnish cannot help "going" on a much-used fiddle. The back is worn with a great round wear at the bottom of the lower curves, where the fiddle was clasped to the master's breast; and a circular wear in the centre of the back shows that he was in the habit of putting it down anywhere, and not of scrupulously returning it to its case. To the left of this round wear is, alas! a little patch where the varnish has been torn off when the municipal seal, which, at first stuck here on the back, was afterwards removed and placed upon the scroll, where it is comparatively harmless. The edges, save at the top and bottom, are perfectly strong and unworn. The back, which is made in two pieces, as in the generality of fine violins, is carved out of the most magnificent maple. The head of the violin, which has been fitted to the instrument with a new neck, is very finely cut, and has those deep grooves carved round the scroll which the French call les coulisses de la tête finely chiselled, and the varnish here is caked in layers, which show all its richness. Strange to say, the head has not been much worn by tuning round the scroll, where it generally shows wear; but the back of the head is almost worn flat—another evidence of its having lain about on tables and so on when not in use. The "chin" of the scroll is very much pointed, and the "nut" over which the strings pass to the bridge is made of ivory. I have been thus minute in my description of the wear, as it affords us such an insight into Paganini's manner of playing. The patch by the side of the tailpiece and the large wear on the back tell of the force with which he held the instrument so as to be able to run his hand up the finger-board, and actually lean it upon the instrument in those high and pizzicato passages, which account for the long groove down the side of the finger-board and the broad patch at the side of the neck, on the table of the instrument. The wearing away of the edges in the curves of the instrument bear a striking testimony to the force with which he sawed the gut in his bravura passages on the first and fourth strings. Indeed, one has only to look at the fantastic patches of exposed wood here and there upon the fiddle to conjure up the ghostly fingers that wore them bare, and the grotesque figure which it completed.

Attached to the head of the instrument by green ribbons and the seal of the municipality, is a card bearing the seal of Baron Achille Paganini, and the words "Violino di Nicolo Paganini" in his handwriting. A bow, the one he always used, stands with the violin beneath the crystal dome. The length of the whole fiddle is 60cm., that of the body, 35½cm. from neck to rest.

The following document is attached to the holder of the instrument:—"Genova: il quattro Luglio Mille otte cento cinquant' uno. Cartolina annessa al Violino del fu' Barone Nicola (sic) Paganini, firmata da tutte le parti intervenute nell atto della consegna del Violino medesimo, fatto in questo giorno à rogito del Notaro Giacomo Borsotto pure sottoscritto." Then follow fourteen signatures, and the seal of the municipal arms.

With this document there is also beneath the case a gold medal exhibited, bearing on the obverse the arms of Genoa, and the words "Ordo Decur. Genu"; and on the reverse the Legend "Nic. Paganino | Fidicini | cui nemo par fuit | civique | bene merenti | Amdcccxxxiii." This medal was (it will be observed), struck six years before the death of Paganini.

I cannot now go into the many incidents in the life of this fiddle, which have been handed down to us by such historians as Fétis, Vidal, and Fleming, how it was once nearly left at an inn by his servant, and the touching story of Paganini's agony of mind when in 1836 it had to undergo a thorough repair. It was on this occasion that Vuillaume made the celebrated copy which Camillo Sivori received as a present from Paganini, and which he has played upon all his life, whether in public or private.

On the day following the events recorded above, the duties of my mission called me away from Genoa, and I went to take one farewell look at the fiddle in whose company I had spent three anxious, but ecstatic hours. The door of the safe was locked and secured with three huge seals, and in answer to my look of enquiry, and startled "Perché?" the custodian replied:—"The violin does not exhibit itself. An English milor had it under observation during yesterday, and it has been here enclosed by His Excellency Il Sindaco, until the English milor shall have gone away from the città. They are always causing disturbances, these English!"

THE ignorance and prejudice of the literary man, when he deviates into the sphere of music, has often been the theme of the justly indignant musician. Some slight consolation is to be derived from the fact that he generally contrives to afford amusement to the latter class. He is in their eyes much what a Frenchman discoursing on cricket is to a public schoolboy, or Ouida quoting Latin to a scholar. But he becomes dangerous rather than ridiculous—as M. de Saint-Saëns, amongst others, points out—when he quits the region of details for the safer ground of generalities, and brings the weight of his fine style and literary prestige to bear against the claims of the youngest of the arts. In either case, however, it is a welcome sight to witness summary justice being dealt out to the offender, and the merciless exposure of the gentleman who talked of Beethoven's Farewell Symphony, by "Indignans" [see the St. James's Gazette, of the 8th ult.], may exercise a wholesome deterrent influence on the chorus of "indolent reviewers." At the same time, let us frankly own our conviction that the vagaries of those who profess to further the interests of music, but in reality hamper them, are quite as prejudicial. It would be easy to fill a column every month with the record of such blunders, but we must content ourselves with putting only a select few in the pillory. A Bath paper, commenting on the rehearsal of the "Martyr of Antioch," states that in the absence of Mr. Edward Lloyd, Sir Arthur Sullivan sang all the tenor music in the minor key. This is, perhaps, surpassed by a delicious piece of Queen's English, in the Court Circular, of the 15th ult.:—"Madame Nilsson had the honour of singing before the Queen and the Royal Family after dinner. Signor Tosti accompanied and sang two duets with Madame Nilsson, on the pianoforte." We may also mention, in connection with Court music, that a report of the performance of the St. Anne's Choir before the Queen appeared in the same issue of one of our dailies in which the announcement was made of the postponement of the Concert. Nextly, we have to note the statement in the Saturday Review, of the 10th ult., that Beethoven's "Kiss of salutation" was bestowed on Liszt in 1811. Either Liszt's precocity has been underrated, and he must have performed the unheard-of feat of winning the recognition of Beethoven in the year of his birth, or, accepting his age at the time as thirteen, he must now be close upon ninety. The only other solution of the difficulty—the bold assertion that the Saturday Review is in the wrong—involves an act of presumption hardly to be contemplated in view of the high literary eminence of that journal. Finally, we read in the Globe, of the 16th ult., in a notice of the Philharmonic Concert of the previous evening, that Herr Joachim, in response to an imperative encore, played Bach's well-known "Chaconne," an assertion which is not only prima facie improbable, but absolutely incorrect.

Now that English Opera, as well as Opera in English, must force composers to consider the adaptability of our language to the purposes of dramatic art, it might be well to reflect upon the possibility of choosing those words in the construction of an operatic libretto which most readily lend themselves to musical setting. Addison says "the sounds of our English words are commonly like those of string music, short and transient, which rise and perish upon a single touch; those of other languages are like the notes of wind instruments, sweet and swelling, and lengthened out into variety of modulations." This is no doubt to a certain extent true; but, as we have hinted, something might be done by our poets to lessen this defect. In a very sensible article on the subject, by Elsie M. Wilbor, which lately appeared in a periodical called The Voice, we read the following:—"We have done everything in our power to multiply the already too large number of consonants in our language. True each of the five vowels has several sounds, but we are very sparing of them in the construction of words. Take, for example, the word 'drowned.' In its seven component letters there are but two vowels, over against five consonants. This would not be so bad if only we pronounced both of the vowels; but what is the fact? We totally ignore the e in what should be a second syllable, leaving the poor o to be literally 'drown'd' in a sea of unfriendly consonants." Then, speaking of the constant hissing of the letter s, it is remarked "how much more melodious is the 'walketh' and 'talketh' of olden times, than the sharp, short 'walks' and 'talks' of to-day. If hissing elements are not pleasant in speech, where it is not necessary to dwell on them, how much less are they in song, when syllables are frequently prolonged for several counts." Much is said about the suitability of a story for operatic treatment: let us hope that in future as much will be thought upon the suitability of the words in which the story is expressed.

AN interesting communication from the Recreative Evening Schools Association appeared in the daily papers of the 20th ult. As our readers are probably aware, from previous references in these columns, musical drill and singing occupy a prominent position in the scheme of recreative instruction adopted by the London School Board, and the letter in question contains the satisfactory assurance that "since the middle of January these evening classes have been introduced in about thirty London schools, with most gratifying and encouraging results." We hope before long to furnish our readers with some more detailed account of the operations of this excellent organisation. For the present, however, we may remark that the musical education of the masses in England is worthy of encouragement as a means of securing the goodwill of the leaders of public opinion in Ireland, at whose feet, to quote the forcible language of the Spectator, the United Kingdom lies prostrate. In a résumé of his experiences during his visit to Wales, Mr. Michael Davitt remarks, à propos of a meeting at Festiniog, "These Welsh quarrymen struck me as being infinitely more intelligent and spirituelle (sic) than the corresponding class of Englishmen. . . . One most agreeable incident at my meeting at Festiniog was the singing by the entire audience of a Welsh song called . . . 'The land of my fathers.' It was an immense treat to hear these quarrymen singing with such exquisite taste and undoubted great musical intelligence. This cultivation of music among the Welsh people is probably one of the chief causes of the superior intelligence of Welsh over English quarrymen." We cannot be quite certain whether Mr. Davitt means that, other things being equal, music makes a man a better man or a better quarryman. This question would best be treated in the form of a Platonic dialogue. But the fact remains that Celtic antipathy towards the Sassenach is likely to be mitigated by the general spread of musical taste among the latter.

To those who apparently still act under the belief that talking has no right to cease when music commences, we have often thought that it would be an excellent reproof if the aggrieved executants were to enforce the maxim that music should cease when talking commences. There can be no doubt that the powerful claims of the art are gradually becoming more extensively recognised; but a gentle admonition of the kind we have mentioned occasionally administered, either in private or in public, would, we believe, materially help on the cause, and at least plead for the courtesy due to those engaged in the music, if not for the respect due to the music itself. We have frequently received letters calling attention to this subject; and on one occasion, when we printed the communication of a correspondent who complained of the buzz of voices during the concert of a provincial Society, which prevented his enjoyment of the music, a reply was forwarded to us from an official of the Society, saying that a great portion of the subscribers came into the room to meet their friends, and that a little social chat with each other was always looked forward to with much pleasure. But in proof that such interruptions are not only tolerated, but in some cases invited, we may point to a quotation from a printed card now before us, descriptive of the musical meeting of a club. After the usual loyal toasts, several solo and concerted vocal pieces occur; and then we have the following item: "Interval for Conversation, during which will be sung —," and here follow the names of a glee and two part-songs. We know not why these pieces should have been selected for "conversational accompaniments," for they are certainly about the best numbers in the programme.

THE beneficial effect of music, both for physical and mental infirmities, has often been enlarged upon; and we frequently read of cures by means of this gentle agent, the facts of which have been duly attested by medical men. But in all the cases we have heard of, the patient has been constantly brought under the influence of the most calm and soothing manifestations of the art, by voices or instruments, so that he may, almost insensibly, be lulled into sweet forgetfulness of his ailments, and even be brought into such a state as to long for the time when he shall again drink in those sounds which have proved more effectual than the draughts of the most skilled physician. A paragraph in a recent number of the United Service Gazette has, however, roughly assailed all our preconceived notions on the matter; for we are told that some short time ago, "a Spanish soldier was brought to a military hospital at Havana in a state of catalepsy, and for fifteen months he showed no signs of improving health. At last the doctors ordered the bagpipes to be played near his bed, whereupon the man promptly recovered consciousness, and is now able to articulate." We regret that only these bare facts are before us, for it would have been exceedingly interesting if the medical report of the case had appeared, so that we might learn in what manner performance upon an instrument which, under ordinary circumstances, would be kept as far away as possible from a sick chamber, effected so magical a result. We have often ourselves been made to "articulate" on hearing the sound of the bagpipes; but assuredly had we been in a state of catalepsy we should—had we been consulted on the subject—infinity have preferred to remain so.

AMONGST the numerous manifestations of musical activity observable in England in late years, the development of the brass band must be allowed to take a prominent rank. To the metropolitan and fastidious reader the term is perhaps synonymous with street music of a peculiarly blatant and disagreeable type, performed by starveling foreigners or the propagandists of sensational religion. They will therefore be hardly prepared to recognise in this much-decried institution one of the most effective means of popularising good music. Yet any one who has attended one of the brass band contests, so often held in Lancashire or Yorkshire, can hardly fail to be convinced of this. Apart from the merit of the music performed, and the manner of its execution, the public spirit of the performers is shown in the generosity with which they contribute out of their hard-earned wages the funds necessary for the purchase of their instruments. The vigour of the movement is further evidenced by the existence of a Brass Band News, published at Liverpool. In the number for March, which lies before us, besides a well-written London letter, and an account of a new Wagnerian contest-selection from "Tannhäuser," "Lohengrin," and the "Flying Dutchman," we notice a long and interesting letter by Mr. Franz Grönings, containing several excellent suggestions with regard to the organisation of future contests, and in general marked by that sound sense and thorough knowledge of the subject which, amid the ignorance and repetition of other writers, singled out his letters to the Era as by far the most valuable contribution to the pitch controversy.

THE first performance of Gounod's "Mors et Vita" in Paris is to be given at the Trocadero, on the 22nd inst. The solo parts will be taken by Madame Kraus, Madame Conneau, M. Faure, and Mr. Lloyd, who goes to Paris expressly for the purpose of singing the tenor music. The composer himself will conduct, and a very fine rendering of the work may be anticipated.

ROYAL ALBERT HALL CHORAL SOCIETY.

THE two final performances of this Society for the season may be dealt with briefly. Those who declared that "The Redemption" would cease to attract as soon as public curiosity concerning it had been satisfied, have yet to wait for the fulfilment of their predictions. At any rate, there was no sign of waning interest at the performance on March 31, the Albert Hall being well filled, and the attentive demeanour of the audience showing the absorbing influence of the theme so solemnly and touchingly illustrated by the great French composer. For the first time since the production of the work by this Society, Madame Albani was not engaged for the soprano solo music, her place being taken by Madame Biro de Marion. This artist did some useful work both in the Italian and German Opera Companies at Covent Garden Theatre a season or two ago, but she failed to justify her engagement as an Oratorio singer. The quality of her voice is singularly harsh and unpleasant, and its compass is also deficient, as was shown in the beautiful air "From Thy love as a Father," which so far from being redemanded, went almost without a hand. This was the only defect in the performance, the other leading vocalists, Miss Hilda Coward, Miss Hilda Wilson, Mr. Lloyd, Mr. Santley, and Mr. Watkin Mills acquitting themselves in their customary irreproachable manner, while the choruses were rendered to absolute perfection by Mr. Barnby's splendidly drilled force. A simple record of the fact that the season ended with the usual Good Friday performance of "The Messiah" will suffice; Madame Albani, Miss Hilda Wilson, Mr. Ben Davies, and Mr. Watkin Mills were the soloists. The audience was one of the largest ever seen in the Albert Hall.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.

SULLIVAN'S Cantata "The Martyr of Antioch" and Rossini's "Stabat Mater" must be regarded as an attractive combination, and nothing but an adequate performance was needed to complete the satisfaction of the audience at the Concert on the 16th ult. In some respects, reasonable anticipations were fulfilled, but in others there were grounds of complaint. As regards the chorus, defects were noticeable just where they were least expected. Mr. Cummings has proved himself an admirable choirmaster, but the unaccompanied funeral anthem, "Brother, thou art gone before us," was rather coarsely rendered, nothing like a genuine pianissimo being obtained. On the other hand, the Pagan choruses were delivered with much spirit and energy. Similar inequality was noticeable in the efforts of the soloists. Madame Patey has never sung the contralto part more finely, and Mr. Lloyd's rendering of the airs, "Come, Margarita, come," and "See what Olybius' love," was unsurpassable for purity of vocal method and expression. Mr. W. H. Burgon seemed out of voice, and unable to do himself justice. The credit due to good intentions must be given to Miss Pauline Cramer. She sang with much earnestness, and her fine soprano voice told well in declamatory passages; but her intonation was not always good, and her pronunciation of English was extremely defective. We mention these points, as improvement is only a matter of study, and Miss Cramer has the making of an excellent oratorio singer.

CRYSTAL PALACE.

THE Concert of March 27 falling on the anniversary of Beethoven's death, the first part of the programme was entirely devoted to works by that master, which were rendered in so admirable a fashion that the subsequent selections inevitably partook of the nature of an anti-climax. After a spirited performance of the "Prometheus" Overture, Herr Joachim made his first appearance at the Palace this season in the violin Concerto. The unlucky snapping of a string just at the point where the solo instrument enters, broke the continuity of the first movement and seemed to affect the soloist; and it was not until the Larghetto was reached that he had recovered his usual mastery of resource. Of the performance of the Symphony (No. 7), we can give no better description than by saying that it was played as if it were a special favourite of Mr. Manns's, and that the Allegretto deserved the encore accorded to it on the occasion of its first production. After the Symphony the descent to "Ernani involami" was rather a bathos. Miss Kate Flinn, who made her début at the Palace on this occasion, has a soprano of considerable range but rather hard quality, and needs to be reminded that a sense of accent which creates sforzandi where none are indicated is almost as bad as the lack of that sense. Miss Flinn created a favourable impression in which we could not share by her singing of Grieg's "Solvejg's Lied" and Franz's "Im Herbst." The prevailing characteristic of each is pathos, but by hurrying the tempo in the refrain of the former and introducing staccato effects where none are marked in the latter, an inappropriate cheerfulness was imported into her renderings.

Herr Joachim gave great pleasure by his finished performance of three pieces by Schumann:—"Garten melodie," "Am Springbrunnen" (orchestrated by Rudolf), and best of all the beautiful "Abendlied," effectively though simply arranged by himself; and the Concert wound up with Moszkowski's clever gleanings from foreign lands (Aus Aller Herren Länder), a set of six short pieces, each in the spirit of the national music of a different European country. The Russian episode, an Allegretto in A minor, is particularly attractive, after which the Spanish and Hungarian numbers are the most effective. Altogether these pieces afford convincing proof of the versatility and charm of this composer so long as he keeps within a somewhat limited compass.

Brahms's new Symphony, No. 4, had been promised as the novelty for the eighteenth Concert, in case the score and parts could be obtained. This consummation unfortunately was not realised, but Mr. Manns did well to fill the gap by the C minor Symphony of the same author, which had been only heard once, and at such an interval that its repetition would have been welcome in any case. For it is only by familiarity with a work of such depth that we can hope fully to fathom its meaning and appreciate its beauties. We must confess to an inability to comprehend the drift of the first movement, while fully conscious of its power. One feels that it is worth making an effort to understand such music—a feeling which is not always excited by the unintelligible. On the other hand, the Andante and Allegretto are of great melodic beauty, while the Finale bears the stamp of unmistakable greatness, abounding as it does in magical and solemn effects. Pan Franz Ondricek followed up the favourable impression created at the Philharmonic Concert, by a fine rendering of Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto. With an excellent sense of rhythm, considerable volume of tone, and excellent intonation, he combines a fine technique, attacking the highest notes and taking the greatest leaps with great confidence and precision. His execution was brilliantly displayed in Paganini's "Le Streghe," the notorious difficulties of which were surmounted with triumphant ease. But one could not help feeling that, for the complete success of such pyrotechnic music, a full room and gaslight are indispensable. The vocalists on this occasion were Miss Robertson (who, at a few hours' notice, undertook to replace Mlle. Oselio) and Mr. Ernest Birch. The former, in Paisiello's "Nel cor piu," proved how closely a human voice, capable of far better things, can be made to imitate the piccolo. The song is as good a proof as can be found of the justice of Schumann's strictures upon Italian melody. Miss Robertson was also heard in Waley's "Sing on, ye little birds," a graceful and flowing song, with a very unpretending accompaniment for flute. Mr. Ernest Birch made a creditable first appearance in Mendelssohn's "It is enough" ("Elijah"). The remaining numbers in the programme were Cherubini's familiar "Anacreon" Overture, and Mr. Mackenzie's Scotch Rhapsody in G, No. 1, the analysis of which was prefaced by some interesting biographical details of a musician "whose name"—as we hold with the writer—"will soon be a household word throughout the three Kingdoms."

Of the last two Concerts, full particulars of which will be found elsewhere, it will be enough to say that they brought the series to a brilliant close, the Concert room on both occasions having been crowded with an enthusiastic audience.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

THE novelty at the third Concert, on the 1st ult., was Dvorák's Violin Concerto in A minor (Op. 53), played by Pan Franz Ondricek, for the first time in England. We are so accustomed to expect originality in the Bohemian composer's works, that criticism based upon a slavish adherence to recognised models becomes absolutely valueless; and we are content, therefore, to abandon ourselves to the enjoyment of the abstract music presented to us. In spite of the individuality with which he invests every composition from his pen, however, he rarely becomes rhapsodical; and the first movement of the Concerto under notice, therefore, startled many, even of his staunchest admirers. On a single hearing of so thoughtful a work we have assuredly no right to pass judgment upon its merits, especially as the themes for the solo violin arrest the attention, both from their intrinsic beauty and the exquisite manner in which they are accompanied by striking orchestral figures, the modifications and developments of these subjects being exceedingly ingenious and effective. It may, however, be mentioned that the non-reappearance of the second subject (as it may assuredly be termed), in the relative major, is somewhat disappointing. Without the slightest break the Adagio commences with a lovely melody for the violin, the solo instrument afterwards floridly accompanying a subject for the string quartet, the movement closing with reminiscences of the matter already heard. In the Finale we have a succession of characteristic dance tunes, woven most effectively into a movement of the Rondo form, and ending with a Coda of much importance, the passages for the solo violin being admirably written for the legitimate display of the instrument. The Concerto was very finely played, beauty of tone, truth of phrasing, and facility of execution being revealed in the highest degree throughout the work, the close of the piece producing a perfect storm of applause, and the performer being recalled amidst much enthusiasm. Mdlle. Clotilde Kleeberg gave an exceptionally fine rendering of Mendelssohn's Pianoforte Concerto in G minor, and the orchestra was heard to the utmost advantage in Schubert's Symphony in C, which commenced the Concert, the Pastoral Introduction and Overture to the second part of Sullivan's "Light of the World," and Beethoven's "Namensfeier" Overture. An apology was made for Madame Rose Hersee, on the score of indisposition, but she sang both the songs set down for her—Lotti's "Pur dicesti," and Meyerbeer's "Nobil Signor." The fourth Concert, on the 15th ult., commenced with Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, which in all its minutest details, was given with a perfection rarely heard, and received with an enthusiasm amply evidencing the thorough appreciation of the large audience assembled. The steady advance of Miss Fanny Davies in public estimation fully justified the directors in engaging her for these Concerts, and we cannot but award her the highest praise for selecting Sterndale Bennett's Concerto in C minor, considering that its composer's early career was so intimately connected with the Philharmonic Society. In every respect the work was admirably performed, and Miss Davies may fairly be congratulated upon the position she has so rapidly gained as an exponent of the highest class of compositions. At the end of each movement the applause was warm and unanimous, and the audience would not rest satisfied without a double recall of the performer at the conclusion of the work. Nothing beyond a record of the rendering of Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto by Herr Joachim is necessary, save that we scarcely remember to have ever heard him play more finely, a fact acknowledged not only by the applause which followed his retirement from the platform, but by a persistent encore, which we regret to say was complied with. The vocalist was Miss Gertrude Griswold, who gave with much effect Massenet's "Il est doux, il est bon," from "Hérodiade," and two graceful songs by Goring Thomas, artistically accompanied by Miss Mary Carmichael. The programme ended with Spohr's Overture to "Jessonda." At both the Concerts noticed Sir Arthur Sullivan conducted with that thorough command over his unequalled orchestra which has done so much to raise the fame of the Society in the estimation of all real music-lovers.

MONDAY AND SATURDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

If all is well that ends well the twenty-eighth season of these entertainments must be regarded as a prodigious success, for it culminated in a series of triumphs, substantial as well as artistic. It is not Mr. Chappell's plan to announce the engagement of a great artist with a flourish of trumpets, but the simple words "Sonata, Beethoven, Madame Schumann," were enough to tell the public that he had been successful in inducing the most gifted female pianist of the century to once more visit the metropolis where she is always so well received. The effusive but not extravagant warmth of her reception on Saturday, March 27, must have been some compensation for the fatigue of her journey, and convinced her of the unswerving loyalty of English audiences to those who have once gained their confidence and esteem. No trace of failing powers could be detected in Madame Schumann's rendering of "Les Adieux, l'absence, et le retour." The lovely singing tone and expressive but unexaggerated method were as remarkable as ever, and at the close there was a great demonstration, the shilling occupants of the orchestra pelting the artist with flowers, while the rest of the audience applauded so long and vigorously that at last the pianist accepted the encore and played one of her late husband's pieces. It must suffice to record that Schumann's Quartet in F (Op. 41, No. 2), Haydn's in G (Op. 77), and Veracini's Largo and Allegro for violoncello completed the programme, and that Miss Carlotta Eliott was the vocalist.

On the following Monday the scene was one of even greater excitement and enthusiasm. Beethoven's Septet and Madame Schumann in the "Waldstein" Sonata! Need it be said that St. James's Hall proved far too small to accommodate all who desired to be present, many being glad to obtain standing room in the gangways of the stalls. At no time within our remembrance has the distinguished pianist given a finer rendering of Beethoven's most popular Sonata. It was an ideal rendering of a magnificent work, and fully justified the furor of the audience, though it was unreasonable to ask for more. However, obstinacy at length prevailed, and the player gave them Schumann's favourite Arabesque as a bonne bouche. The programme was rendered additionally interesting by the introduction of a Sonata in A, for piano and violin, by Herzogenberg (Op. 32). The work is dedicated to Herr Joachim, by whom, with Miss Zimmermann, it was performed. The name of the composer is quite unfamiliar here, and the musical dictionaries say very little concerning him, even Mendel's "Conversations Lexicon," only telling us that he has produced several works, and that he lived first at Gratz and then at Leipzig. He is evidently a talented musician, his Sonata being not only a pleasing but a very clever work. The themes are melodious, and they are developed with much skill, though with no suspicion of labour. The work was therefore favourably received, and it will be well to bring forward other examples from the same source. Mr. Henry Piercy sang in a very agreeable manner Lieder by Mendelssohn and Rubinstein. Two favourite concerted works were the principal attraction on Saturday, the 3rd ult.—namely, Beethoven's Quintet in C (Op. 29), and Rheinberger's Pianoforte Quartet in E flat (Op. 38). The former shares the popularity of the Rasumowsky Quartets, for it is one of Beethoven's finest Chamber works, and the earliest in which he shows his complete emancipation from the style of Haydn and Mozart. It is disappointing that Rheinberger has not followed up the great promise of his piano Quartet. The work is full of beauty and originality, but the composer has not produced anything else half so good. Mr. Max Pauer, who was the pianist on this occasion, introduced four numbers of Brahms's cleverly written, but not particularly interesting, "Clavierstücke" (Op. 76), which he played with much technical skill.

Another extremely attractive selection was provided on the following Monday. It commenced with a new Sonata in D, for piano and violoncello, by Signor Piatti, the fruit of his recent enforced retirement from public life. Little more than a year has elapsed since the production of his first Sonata in F, for the same instruments. The new work is scarcely so pleasing, but in one sense it is superior, in that the piano part is more important, and the composer has conceded something to modern ideas in employing an identical theme in each of the three movements. This serves as the principal subject of the opening section, as an accompaniment in the middle movement, and as an air for variations in the Finale. The adagio lento is by far the best part of the Sonata, which was perfectly played by the composer and Miss Zimmermann, and well received. Another novelty was a set of Variations by Madame Schumann on her late husband's "Albumblatt" (No. 4, Op. 99). Brahms has written some extremely interesting Variations on the same theme in his Op. 9. Those by Madame Schumann are less important though tastefully conceived. She also played Schumann's Sketch for pedal piano (Op. 58, No. 1) and the Noveltte in F (Op. 21, No. 1), and for once the audience did not insist upon an encore, perhaps because she was announced to join Herr Joachim later on in the Sonata in A minor, for piano and violin (Op. 105). Though a late work, dating from 1851, this Sonata is one of Schumann's most genial efforts. The allegretto, which stands in place of a slow movement, is a veritable little gem. Beethoven's splendid Quartet in C (Op. 59, No. 3) formed an imposing climax to the Concert. The vocalist was Miss Liza Lehmann, a daughter of the well-known artist of that name. She is very youthful, and her voice is at present small in volume; but it has been well trained, and its quality is agreeable. She sang some old Italian airs and songs by Liszt and Maude White with excellent taste.

The scene on Saturday the 10th was remarkable even in this phenomenal season. It was calculated that more than a thousand people were turned away from the doors, though every inch of standing room was utilised. The programme was certainly as attractive as it could well be throughout, for there are few more popular concerted works than Schubert's Quartet in D minor and Beethoven's Pianoforte Trio in B flat, to say nothing of Schumann's "Carnaval" as interpreted by his gifted widow. Rarely has the last-named popular work received a more beautiful and refined rendering, the only cause for complaint being that four numbers were omitted—namely, Eusebius, Florestan, Coquette, and Replique. It is equally impossible to imagine a finer performance of the Schubert Quartet, Herr Joachim and his companions being in their very best form. The piano part in Beethoven's Trio was rendered in a surprisingly able manner by Mr. Hollins the blind pianist, lately a student at the Royal Normal College. His playing was not only expressive but note perfect, and there was not the slightest cause for any allowance on the ground of his natural infirmity. Mr. Santley contributed some of the most familiar songs in his repertory. The unexpected presence of Dr. Liszt on the following Monday constituted a special feature of interest. It was a Beethoven programme, the works being the Quartet in F (Op. 59, No. 1), the Sonata in A flat (Op. 110), and the Kreutzer Sonata, for piano and violin (Op. 47). Any critical remarks on these would be superfluous, and it is only necessary to mention that Herr Joachim was the leader and Mr. Charles Hallé the pianist to indicate that the performance was all that could be desired. Mr. Santley was again the vocalist, his selections being Gounod's expressive "The Arrow and the Song" and Handel's "Del mio macciar del vento."

The final Saturday programme was more varied than usual, both as regards works and artists. It opened with Haydn's Quartet in E flat (Op. 64, No. 2), the next work being Mozart's Sonata in G, for piano and violin, one of a set of six published in 1781. Like everything left by Mozart, the Sonata is well worthy of a hearing though not specially remarkable. Miss Fanny Davies and Herr Joachim were the executants. Madame Schumann gave two of her husband's Canons for pedal piano (Op. 56), and, as an encore, the familiar Nachtstück in F. Miss Emily Shinner joined Herr Joachim in a Tempo di Minuetto with variations, for two violins, by Spohr, and greatly pleased by her masterly playing. The finest performance of the afternoon, however, was that of Beethoven's Trio in E flat (Op. 70, No. 2), with Madame Schumann at the piano. It was an ideal rendering of a beautiful work. Mr. Lloyd was the vocalist and Mr. Hopkins Ould proved an admirable accompanist.

The final Concert may be briefly dismissed, for, as a matter of course, the programme consisted of familiar and favourite works. Brahms's Sextet in B flat (Op. 18) may be so described, and so in greater measure may Schumann's Quintet in E flat (Op. 44). The performance of the latter masterpiece, with Madame Schumann at the pianoforte, was a treat of the highest order. The gifted artist played some of Mendelssohn's Lieder, and steadfastly declined an encore; but Herr Joachim succumbed after three of Brahms's Hungarian Dances. Miss Liza Lehmann contributed some songs entirely to the satisfaction of the audience, and so in all respects the forty-first and last Concert was a brilliant success. It is well to have the official assurance that the next season will commence early in November.

LONDON MUSICAL SOCIETY.

It would have been unfortunate, not to say unfair, if Dr. Villiers Stanford's Oratorio "The Three Holy Children" had suffered neglect during the present London season, considering that all the other important novelties at last year's Birmingham Festival have been brought to a hearing without delay. Thanks are therefore due to the London Musical Society, which has taken the lead on other occasions, for coming to the rescue with the Cambridge musician's work, which was duly given in St. James's Hall, on the 7th ult. Unfortunately the time and circumstances were far from propitious. The excitement concerning Liszt was culminating; and, further, the Society's performances are of a quasi-private nature—perhaps for good and sufficient reasons, but manifestly to the disadvantage of a new work of importance. A second hearing of "The Three Holy Children" fully confirms the opinions expressed upon it in last October's MUSICAL TIMES. In the first part Dr. Stanford has put forth more power than in any of his earlier compositions. The "March of the Assyrian Soldiers," the soprano solo and chorus, "If I forget thee, O Jerusalem," with its impassioned climax, and the concluding chorus, "The heathen shall fear Thy name," are numbers of which any living composer might feel proud. The same may be said of the grand final chorus of the Oratorio "O all ye works of the Lord," which contains some very fine contrapuntal writing in the Handelian style, and a highly imposing climax. But a considerable portion of the second part is unquestionably tedious, more particularly the music of the three Captives and the air and chorus "Ye are my witnesses." Perhaps it is too late now to revise the work, and even as it stands it is a valuable addition to the repertory of English Oratorio. Though not on a large scale, the performance was on the whole creditable. Mr. Barnby's choir sang with commendable steadiness, if not with much power; and the only fault that could be found with the orchestra, was its smallness. The strings were very feeble, and in fact could not be heard when the wind contingent was in full play. The solo parts were ably sustained by Miss Anna Williams, Mr. Lloyd, Mr. R. Grice, Mr. T. Kempton, and Mr. W. H. Brereton. One circumstance in connection with the Concert was so remarkable as to deserve record. From first to last the analytical programme contained no mention of the composer's name. The omission led to some amusing enquiries and assertions among the audience, some declaring Mr. Mackenzie to be the author, and others Dr. Bridge and Mr. Prout.

MR. FREDERIC LAMOND'S RECITALS.

THERE is as much truth as triteness about the remark that the pianoforte recital business is being vastly overdone, as has been proved down to the hilt during the past few weeks, when the most gargantuan appetite must have found satiety. It is very unfortunate that so little heed for others besides themselves marks the efforts of those who pertinaciously crowd to the front. The London musical public is very extensive and vastly liberal; it supports entertainments even when their pretensions are greatly in advance of their merits, and is always ready to play the part of benefactor—or, at least, of encouraging advocate—to juvenile artists. But the public purse is not inexhaustible, and if professional musicians will persist in dragging themselves to the fore, whether their talents sanctify such proceedings or not, some of them must retire from the enterprise poorer in pocket, however much richer in vanity. To those who champion the cause of the young Scottish pianist, Mr. Frederic Lamond, these remarks do not appertain; they were well advised in bringing forward a young artist whose executive powers are certainly phenomenal, and in giving him a point d'appui whence he may strike out with redoubled vigour upon his artistic career. The first recital given by the seventeen-year-old Scotch laddie was so fairly astounding that if reason rocked upon her throne there would have been plentiful excuse for it. To find such a mere lad in the possession of such Herculean powers was sufficient to make musicians believe that the millennium was at hand. The results of the two subsequent Recitals, at the same place of entertainment (on March 30 and the 2nd ult.), tended to prove that though there were weak places in this young knight's armour, he was nevertheless armed cap-à-pie, and could do battle with all who were ready to encounter him on open ground. And here is the amazing part of it. Mr. Lamond is no specialist; rather, like the Clown in "Twelfth Night," he is "for all waters," and is as much at home in the old school as the new—with the classicists as with the romanticists. The repose and sustained delicacy requisite to ensure an adequate interpretation of Chopin, hardly belong to the temperament of the juvenile executant; but inasmuch as he possesses every technical qualification to deal with the capricious works of the fascinating Polish composer, the acquisition of the necessary sentiment is only a matter of time and study. At the second Recital the programme included Brahms's Sonata in F minor (Op. 5); Beethoven's Six Variations in D (Op. 76); Chopin's Ballade (Op. 23), Mazurka (Op. 59, No. 3), and Nocturne (Op. 27, No. 1); Mendelssohn's Scherzo (Op. 5); Schumann's Fantasia in C (Op. 17); Tausig's arrangement of Schubert's Marche Militaire; Liszt's rearrangement of Schubert's "Soirées de Vienne"; Etude by F. Lamond; and Liszt's "Venezia e Napoli" Tarantella. Such a selection might try to the utmost the skill and address of the most omnivorous virtuoso, but Mr. Lamond made many more hits than misses.

At the following Recital the selection was as follows:—Sonata in B flat, Op. 106 (Beethoven); Variations on a Hungarian theme, Op. 21, No. 2 (Brahms); Sonata in F sharp minor, Op. 11 (Schumann); Preludes, Barcarole, Nocturne, and Scherzo (Chopin); and fugitive pieces by Tschaiikowsky, Joachim, Raff, and Liszt. It was courageous in the young pianist to encounter the famous "Op. 106," because here he trod upon ground where there is scant honour to be won, though a good deal may be lost by such an act of temerity. It must be said, however, that Mr. Lamond's playing was finished and intelligent, and if it were something lacking in depth or majesty, the defection can both be explained and condoned in the truism that we must not look for old heads upon young shoulders. The best features of this performance were undoubtedly the interpretation of Brahms's Variations and Schumann's not over-attractive Sonata.

At the request of many friends, Mr. Lamond gave a fourth Recital, but on this occasion was wisely advised to remove the arena of his efforts to St. James's Hall, where better conditions as to light, comfort, and space obtain. For this performance the patronage of the Abbé Liszt was secured; and, inasmuch as the visit of the venerable composer was largely advertised, it may be said that there was a divided interest in the Concert. The great Hungarian master did not arrive at the Hall until about four o'clock, when Mr. Lamond was well on towards the middle of his programme—and had, in fact, commenced the Liszt excerpts which formed so conspicuous a feature of his scheme. The selection included Tausig's arrangement—or derangement—of one of Bach's organ Fugues and Toccata in D minor; Beethoven's "Appassionata" Sonata; a Fantasia by Chopin; Brahms's two "Clavierstücke" (Op. 76); Liszt's "Harmonies du Soir," "Feux Follets," "Mazepa," "Liebestraum," and "Pesther Carnival" (Rhapsody, No. 9); Raff's Fantasia and Fugue (Op. 91); Impromptu by F. Lamond; and Valse by Nicholas Rubinstein. The entry of Liszt of course disturbed the smooth sequence of events, the audience rising to their feet and cheering wildly; but fortunately Mr. Lamond did not lose his nerve, though he certainly looked anxiously round at the master at the conclusion of each piece. The result was satisfactory, as the young pianist received, after the first part, a double recall for his really fine playing, while the Abbé stood up and bowed—a pleased observer of the success of his music.

Unless we mistake greatly, we shall hear more of the young Scotch pianist before long; it is stated that he is about to prosecute his studies under Liszt, in which case both he and the world of pianoforte music in general are to be congratulated.

SEÑOR SARASATE'S CONCERTS.

THE annual series of orchestral Concerts given by Señor Sarasate have become an established institution, and would be greatly missed were the eminent Spanish violinist to discontinue them. Of this there is little likelihood, however, so long as they are as well patronised as at present. Notwithstanding all the distractions of this busy musical season, St. James's Hall was well filled on Monday afternoon, the 19th ult., when the first of the new series was given. The juxtaposition of the Violin Concertos of Beethoven and Mendelssohn was certainly a great attraction, and it is probably the first occasion on which these two great works have appeared in the same programme. No other Violin Concerto comes near to either of them in popularity, nor, we may add, in abstract merit. As Herr Joachim had played both very recently, some among the audience were no doubt able to institute instructive comparisons. The rendering of these masterpieces by the Hungarian violinist is broader, more masculine, and more impassioned than that of his brother-artist; but, on the other hand, Señor Sarasate possesses a silvery sweetness of tone peculiar to himself, and another great charm of his playing is the invariably perfect intonation which he maintains in passages of the utmost difficulty. These qualities were fully manifested on the 19th ult., and the delight of the audience was expressed by numberless recalls. The solo performances were completed by the artist's "Zigeunerweisen," which no one can execute like himself. The able orchestra under Mr. Cusins interpreted Beethoven's Overture "Die Weihe des Hauses," Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsody in F (No. 1), and Schubert's "Rosamunde" Overture in a praiseworthy manner.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

AN orchestral Concert was given by the students of this institution at St. James's Hall, on the 16th ult., before an unusually large audience. Sterndale Bennett's Cantata, "The Woman of Samaria," was appropriately chosen for the commencement of the programme, its rendering both by soloists and choir being in every respect a worthy tribute to the genius of the composer. The principal vocalists were Miss Owen, Miss Jansen, Mr. Humphreys, and Mr. Marsh. Some variations on an original theme, for orchestra, by Mr. Macpherson, afforded an excellent specimen of the talent of a student who has already made a name at these Concerts, and Miss Meta Scott and Mr. E. Fowler were highly satisfactory representatives of the soundness of the pianoforte teaching at the Academy; Miss Clark and Miss Harrison deserving also most favourable mention as vocalists. Mr. William Shakespeare was the Conductor.

ROYAL COLLEGE OF MUSIC.

WANT of space alone compelled us to withdraw our usual monthly notice of the College Concerts from our April issue, and the same cause must be accepted as an excuse for the shortness of the present summary of the work done at the last four meetings before Easter. Two of these were orchestral, at which Symphonies by Schubert (No. 6, in C), Mozart in E flat, and Beethoven (No. 2), Henselt's difficult Pianoforte Concerto in F minor and Mendelssohn's "Hebrides" Overture formed the chief attractions. The "extras" in the orchestra only amounted to a dozen, and the finish and spirit with which these works were given, under the baton of Professors Holmes and Stanford, testify eloquently to the thoroughness of the instrumental instruction received at the Royal College. Amongst the vocalists, Mr. Price, who unites feeling and intelligence to the natural advantages of a resonant bass voice; Miss Russell, a light but sympathetic soprano, who was heard to great advantage in Madame Goldschmidt's own version of "Una voce" ("Il Barbiere"); and Miss Drew, another light soprano who has made great progress in style and production since her last appearance, are specially deserving of notice. The efforts of Misses Belcher and Albu and Mr. Ridding have also in them the elements of promise. Mr. Sutcliffe continues to sustain his reputation as the most finished violinist in the establishment, while, in different styles, Misses Crabtree and Fry have been the most ambitious and successful representatives of pianoforte playing.

WAGNER SOCIETY.

A highly interesting essay on "The inner significance of 'Der Ring des Nibelungen'" was read by Mr. W. C. Ward, at a meeting of the United Richard Wagner Society (London Branch), at Trinity College, on the 13th ult. Only incidental reference was made to the music of the great Trilogy, but the speaker dealt fully with the philosophical import of the poem, showing how it illustrated the moral and spiritual history of humanity. The characters of the drama symbolise the opposing forces with which man has to deal in his struggles towards perfection, Wotan representing formalism and the enslavement of the mind, the giants mere brutish ignorance, Alberich greed and avarice, and Loge cunning and malignity. With these Siegfried, the ideal hero, has to contend, the final victory and redemption being only secured by pure self-sacrificing love, as represented by Brünnhilde. Mr. Ward evinced much familiarity with the myths of the Middle Ages, which Wagner has woven anew into his poem. The lecture was listened to with deep attention, and when published it should be read by all admirers of the great master.

THE STROLLING PLAYERS.

THE growth of Amateur Orchestral Societies is one of the most striking features of musical work in London at the present time. Within the last few years a large number of organisations for the study of instrumental music has sprung up, and among them the body styling itself as above, and founded, we believe, on the association known as the Wandering Minstrels, is entitled to a high, if not the highest, place. The work it accomplishes has the merit of being earnest and thorough, the Conductor, Mr. Norfolk Megone, happily possessing the spirit of enthusiasm which communicates itself to all with whom it comes in contact, the necessary musicianly qualities being of course added. His force consists of more than a hundred players, including, among the strings, a considerable number of ladies. At the last Concert of the present season on Saturday evening, the 10th ult., St. James's Hall was filled from end to end by a brilliant audience, and as the salutary rule of closing the doors during the performance was strictly enforced, the music was heard to the utmost advantage. It included Beethoven's Symphony in D, No. 2, Bizet's Suite "L'Arlésienne," No. 1, and smaller pieces, all of which were rendered in a highly satisfactory manner, considering that the professional contingent numbered less than a dozen players—mostly, of course, for the wind instruments.

BOROUGH OF HACKNEY CHORAL ASSOCIATION.

THE concluding Concert of this Society for the season, on the 12th ult., had features of peculiar interest and importance. The first performance of Beethoven's Choral Symphony was an event of no slight significance, as no other suburban Society, so far as we are aware, had previously ventured to take this colossal work in hand. That Mr. Prout's choir would prove equal to the demands it makes upon performers no one could doubt, but few could have anticipated so really excellent an interpretation. The most trying passages were given with perfect precision, and, on the whole, we are inclined to consider the performance as the best effort of the Society thus far. As a matter of course, the instrumental movements were well played, Mr. Prout and his orchestra understanding one another to the fullest extent. Miss Pauline Cramer, Miss Hilda Wilson, Mr. Holberry Hagyard, and Mr. F. King did ample justice to the solo parts. The work was most enthusiastically received, and it should be repeated at an early date. Previous to the Symphony, Handel's Dettingen Te Deum was performed, with Handel's original accompaniments. The most striking feature in these is the prominence given to the first trumpet part, a prominence which is, of course, destroyed by the addition of trombones. At the same time, in order to obtain the exact balance intended by Handel, a much larger number of oboes and bassoons would be required than is possible in a modern orchestra. Special commendation is due to Mr. W. Morrow for his playing of the trumpet part, but the effect would be less fatiguing to the ear in a larger hall. Though less excellent than that of the Choral Symphony, the general performance left but little to desire.

MUSIC IN BIRMINGHAM.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

IN spite of Lenten influences, the month of April has been a fairly busy one in a musical sense, and the Concerts given have been of a higher class than is customary here at the fag end of the season, including oratorio, pianoforte, and chamber music. Before noticing these, however, a few words are due to an interesting remnant of the previous month which occurred too late for mention in your April issue. I refer to the first Pianoforte Recital of Miss Fanny Davies, which took place in the Masonic Hall on March 30, in presence of an enthusiastic and overflowing audience. Miss Davies's selection, played entirely from memory and without a single slip or hitch, comprised Bach's Organ Fugue in A minor, a couple of harpsichord Studies by Scarlatti, Graun's Gigue in B flat minor, Beethoven's Sonata in A (Op. 101), Mendelssohn's Scherzo Capriccio in F sharp minor, Schumann's "Carnaval," a Prelude and Nocturne in B major, by Chopin, and Rubinstein's Valse in F. As most of these pieces have been recently played by Miss Davies in London at the Monday Popular, Crystal Palace, and other high-class concerts, there is no need to dwell upon the merits of her performance, but the rapturous applause which it elicited from her townspeople may be cited in evidence of the fact that in Birmingham, at all events, you may be a prophet in your own country. Owing to the success of her first Recital and the impossibility of accommodating all who flocked to it, Miss Davies was induced to give a second on the 20th ult., when her selection comprised Bach's Chromatic Fantasia, a couple of Mendelssohn's Songs without words and Capriccio in E (Op. 7), Schumann's Etudes Symphoniques, Chopin's Polonaise in C sharp minor and Impromptu in F sharp, and Sketches by Maude Valérie White. Although this Concert fell in Holy Week, it drew a large and enthusiastic audience, and Miss Davies's playing evidently confirmed and deepened the admiration excited by her first performance.

The monthly Concert of the musical section of the Midland Institute, on the afternoon of the 3rd ult., took the form of a Violin Recital by Mr. Carrodus, who was assisted by Mrs. Hale at the pianoforte, and by a tenor vocalist, Mr. James Gawthrop, of Her Majesty's Chapel Royal. The renowned English violinist was heard to great advantage in Spohr's Concerto in A minor (Op. 47), Svendsen's melodious Romance (Op. 26), and three of Molique's graceful melodies (Op. 36); but his greatest effect was produced in De Beriot's Tremolo variations upon the Andante theme of the Kreutzer Sonata, in which the continuous feather bowing of the performer was a marvel of skill and endurance. Musical pedantry, which flourishes nowhere more luxuriantly than in Birmingham, was excited, as usual, by this "profanation" of a beautiful classic theme, but as the adapter has only followed and developed the treatment pursued by Beethoven himself in his variations, and as the result is a piece affording admirable scope for the display of a virtuoso like Mr. Carrodus, the majority of the audience were simply charmed. Mrs. Hale played with taste, feeling, and considerable technical skill, Beethoven's Sonata Pathétique, and Mr. Gawthrop impressed the audience very favourably both by his voice and style in Handel's "Where'er you walk" (from "Semele"). "The full moon is beaming" (from Smart's "Bride of Dunkerron"), and the Lurline ballad, "Home of my heart."

On the 7th ult., the Edgbaston Amateur Musical Union gave its annual Orchestral Concert in the Large Lecture Theatre of the Midland Institute. The band, numbering some fifty performers, was composed, as usual, of amateurs, with a few professional players of special instruments, and the solo violinist and solo vocalist—both ladies—were also amateurs. The orchestral playing, on the whole, was very effective, though wanting here and there in refinement and finish, more particularly in the execution of the passages for brass instruments. Beethoven's First Symphony in C was creditably played, with the exception of the Andante, in which the weakness and uncertainty of the violins was at times too apparent, but the most successful efforts of the band were in the Overtures to "Anacreon" (Cherubini), "Mirella" (Gounod), and "La Dame blanche" (Boieldieu), all of which were spiritedly and effectively rendered. An interesting feature of the programme was an excerpt (Chaconne and Rigaudon) from De Monsigny's forgotten opera "Aline," which was much admired. Mrs. S. Fenn, at short notice, replaced the solo violinist originally announced, and played with much taste and skill Pierre Rode's seventh Violin Concerto. Miss Preston exhibited a pleasing and well cultivated voice in Handel's "From mighty kings," Mozart's "Deh vieni," and Clay's song "She wandered down the mountain side." The conducting of Mr. A. J. Sutton left nothing to be desired.

A Pianoforte Recital, relieved by violin and vocal performances, was given by Mr. Rickard on the 8th ult., assisted by Mr. Ward (violin) and Miss Walkis (vocalist), in aid of the funds of the Jaffray Suburban Hospital, but the entertainment was more satisfactory in an artistic than in a pecuniary sense. Mr. Rickard, who was in excellent form, impressed the audience greatly by his technical powers in Mendelssohn's Rondo Capriccioso (Op. 14), a Sonata (Op. 31) by Scarlatti, Chopin's Scherzo (Op. 39), Valse (Op. 42), and Etudes (Nos. 20, 21, and 18); Thalberg's "Last Rose of Summer," the Marche à la Turque of Beethoven, arranged by Rubinstein; a Spinnerlied by Wagner, arranged by Liszt; and other pieces by Moszkowski, Weber, and Henselt. Mr. Ward gave a very finished and expressive rendering of the Hymne Triomphale from the third Concerto (Op. 29) of A. Bazzini, and joined Mr. Rickard with excellent effect in the Andante con variazioni and Finale from Beethoven's Kreutzer Sonata.

The Festival Choral Society brought its season to a close on the 15th ult., with a creditable, but by no means immaculate, performance of Mackenzie's "Rose of Sharon," composed for the Norwich Festival of 1884, and performed on this occasion for the first time in Birmingham. The vocal principals were Mrs. Hutchinson, who undertook the music of The Sulamite; Miss Hilda Wilson, upon whom devolved the parts of A Woman, and a member of the Royal household; Mr. Edward Lloyd as The Beloved; and Mr. Watkin Mills as Solomon. The audience was greatly impressed by the earnestness, scholarship, picturesqueness, and masterly elaboration of the composition; but it is more dramatic in form than in spirit. Mrs. Hutchinson is ideally suited to the part of the fascinating Sulamite, both vocally and personally, and she made much of her opportunities, especially charming the audience in the beautiful love duet with The Beloved, and the reposeful song "The Lord is my Shepherd." Mr. Lloyd also was very effective in the principal tenor music, and in the scene in Solomon's palace, in Part 3, where the lovers are reunited, his impassioned singing contributed in no small measure to the enthusiastic outburst of applause with which the duet was greeted. Miss Wilson exhibited dramatic feeling as well as vocal power in her principal solo "Lo! the King," which was heartily applauded, and Mr. Watkin Mills did justice to the music of the amorous Monarch. The chorus singing generally was steady; but there were one or two slips, and the band was hardly heard at its best. The fine string of choruses depicting the Procession of the Ark was on the whole grandly given by both sections of the executive. Mr. Stockley conducted as usual with judgment and decision.

The concluding Chamber Concert of Dr. Swinnerton Heap's second series took place in the Masonic Hall on the 16th ult., and gave great satisfaction to an audience fit though few. The programme comprised Mendelssohn's string Quartet in D (Op. 44, No. 1), Brahms's Quartet for piano and strings in G minor (Op. 25), Beethoven's Pianoforte Sonata in F minor (Op. 57), a Sonata in E minor for pianoforte and violin, by Dr. Heap himself, the Sarabande from Bach's sixth Violoncello Sonata, and Vieuxtemps's Reverie in E flat for pianoforte and violin. Messrs. Carrodus, Speelmann, Bernhardt, and Vieuxtemps composed the string quartet, and the pianoforte was in the capable hands of Dr. Heap. Mr. Carrodus led the Mendelssohn quartet with great vigour and spirit, and produced a deep impression by his masterly playing of the Vieuxtemps "Reverie." Dr. Heap gave an admirable rendering of the Sonata Appassionata (after which he was recalled), and he contributed greatly to the effect of his own duet Sonata, which is full of charm and interest, and developed with musicianly skill and judgment.

On Good Friday the Philharmonic Union gave a performance, in the Town Hall, of "The Messiah," with organ accompaniment, and Madame Wilson-Osman, Miss Iggulden, Mr. Wright, and Mr. Harrison as vocal principals. On the same evening, Mr. Gaul's "Passion" Music was performed, under the composer's direction, at St. Augustine's Church.

MUSIC IN MANCHESTER.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Our musical season has, during the past month, been drawing to a close; the larger speculators have finished their work, and the suburban amateur societies have given their little performances, and shown to select circles of friends the results of their winter practice. The annual Richter Concert, with very little novelty of programme, is announced, and everything betokens the coming of the swallows and the departure of the prime donne.

At the Concert Hall, Mr. Hallé gave, on Monday, the 5th ult., the last of his Recitals, selecting as his chief pieces Schubert's Fantasie Sonata (Op. 78) and Mendelssohn's Presto Scherzando, and playing with his customary delicacy of touch and style. The large audience increased our wonder that, long ago, the need of some such afternoon entertainments and the suitability of the room for them were not recognised. For orchestral celebrations the hall is too small and low. Even for choral undertakings it does not compare in brilliancy of resonance with the Athenæum Concert-room. But for quiet presentation of chamber music, and for the calm enjoyment of performances of a semi-drawing-room character no better place could be found. It is to be hoped that the afternoon répertoire may be materially enlarged.

Signor Risegari's admirable string party should be engaged two or three times during the season. Most suitable would be such a selection as that produced on the evening of March 29, when Beethoven's third Quartet, a Quintet by Kiel, Schubert's Trio, and a Tema con Variazioni for piano and violin (admirably performed by the author, Herr Max Meyer, and Signor Risegari) were given. Later, Mr. Hecht superintended the performance of a less pretentious programme, in which Mr. Gompertz (of Cambridge), made a favourable impression, and Miss Houfer—besides joining the conductor in a couple of piano duets—played with skill Schumann's "Faschingschwank." Mr. Hecht had also the assistance of Madame Clara Samuël, always the most welcome of ballad singers.

Among the miscellaneous Concerts I must mention Mr. G. W. Lane's crowded benefit at the Free Trade Hall, when the Philharmonic Choral Society sang, with considerable vigour, Mendelssohn's "Why rage fiercely the heathen," and several smaller works; and Mr. Seymour Jackson's equally successful summoning of his friends on Saturday, the 10th ult., when Madame Samuël and several local singers added our popular tenor, and Mr. De Jong and Mr. Edgar Haddock helped to vary the programme by flute and violin solos.

A review of the general result of the winter campaign leads to the hope that, financially, the season has been fairly prosperous, but does not afford much ground for congratulation on account of any special display of spirit or energy of production. Of new music we have had very little, and of new English music as nearly as possible none.

It is not pleasant, or creditable, that fresh works should be so long in finding their way into our Manchester programmes. Among the greater orchestral achievements of the last few years that have not yet reached here, may be mentioned Sullivan's Overture "In Memoriam," Mackenzie's two Scotch Rhapsodies (in which the national character is so admirably pictured), the "Belle Dame sans Merci," and the Violin Concerto of the same author, and several works by Stanford. Many other ambitious essays we are curious to hear, but not having attained to such general popularity, it is to be supposed that they may not yet have forced themselves upon the attention of our concert-givers.

For an adequate rendering of Prout's attractive Symphony in F—so well received everywhere else—we yet wait; the more impatiently, because we have been regaled with lots of far inferior things by foreign writers. Of one of the finest tone-poems yet produced by an English artist—the Symphony in B flat by F. H. Cowen—we have had only such an interpretation as is possible in the Concert Hall by the comparatively small band there engaged, and under the unfavourable acoustic conditions to which I have already alluded. That Mr. Hallé should have given three of the choral works written for the last Birmingham Festival (including even the English Oratorio), and should have passed by Cowen's most graceful and finished Cantata, "Sleeping Beauty," inevitably causes grave regret. And we still await—and appear likely to have, for a long time, to await—an opportunity of hearing "The Rose of Sharon."

All the compositions I have mentioned have been received with applause in the different musical centres of the country, and there is something unhealthy, therefore, in

In another way, the past season has been extremely hopeful and encouraging. It has given enhanced evidence of the growing practical skill and the increasing industry and perseverance of our young players and vocalists, and of the localization among us of talent sufficient for our ordinary requirements, and for the satisfaction of the ever-widening district that, in all important musical doings, draw upon Manchester for its chief aid. Everything that tends to develop in our large towns a self-reliant ability in art matters, must be eminently satisfactory. Not infrequently have we been taunted with our provincial helplessness by those who, with masterly inactivity, have contrived to do nothing tending to wipe off the reproach. But if ever the charge was altogether deserved—which I take leave to doubt—its injustice grows with each succeeding year more apparent. Happily it is not in this locality alone that musical culture is becoming more and more vigorous, earnest, and fruitful. Through the midland and northern portions of the Kingdom, as far at least as the Clyde and the Forth, musical meets with an ever growing welcome, and excites a love rapidly becoming more intense and passionate. In this neighbourhood each season shows a considerable advance. During the past winter we have marked with delight the progress of our executive musicians. Among instrumentalists, Miss Annie Goodwin is winning her way, and several young pianists and violinists are coming hopefully forward. Mr. Seymour Jackson is displaying a praiseworthy ambition to take a fair rank among the few tenors of the day. A young soprano, Miss Wallington, attracts much attention, and exhibits a determination to press to the very front. Miss Conway and Miss Dews, Messrs. Kendal Thompson, F. Gordon, James Whittaker, and others, prove the earnestness of their intentions.

Although we vainly look for a greater geniality in the higher influences, a warmer stimulation from above, we have ample evidence that a quietly, but steadily growing power is animating the lower ranks of our artistic community.

What an opportunity for self-help amid the difficulties of its premature old age, as well as of usefulness to those who have a right to look for its encouragement, is afforded just now to the society which claims to be our oldest musical association! Why should the directors of the Concert Hall resort only to amateur aid in their attempt to cater liberally but at small expense, to multiply entertainments while reducing expenditure? Let them put new life into their undertaking, by drawing around them all the young vigour of the neighbourhood, and atone for past missed chances by a better appreciation of the facilities of the present.

MUSIC IN LIVERPOOL.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

OUR season is now fast ebbing away, and the musical record must necessarily diminish in importance and interest. Here at Liverpool, however, the forthcoming "Shippers Exhibition" is not only keeping general public feeling on the qui vive, but is likely to prolong the list of concerts, &c., throughout the year, until the thread is resumed in the late autumn, under normal conditions. It is, we believe, more than probable that when Her Majesty the Queen visits the city on the 11th inst., she will be present at a grand performance at the Exhibition buildings, the rendering of the choral work of which will devolve upon the Philharmonic Choral Society. The importance of their selection for such an occasion is significant.

It cannot be said that Liverpool has, during the past season, lent any material assistance to the introduction of great novelties; but a quasi exception to this may, perhaps, be made in the case of the last Concert of the Philharmonic Society, when Handel's "Belshazzar" was performed. It is a remarkable fact that the undoubted beauties of this work should only so recently have been discovered and appreciated, and it seems strange to have to record the first performance of a Handelian Oratorio of such magnitude a century and a half after its creation. Perhaps the undue length of "Belshazzar," and the occasional monotony of the solos have militated against its more frequent appearance. The choruses, however, are not only distinguished by the massive power and dignity which is the essential characteristic of all Handel's writing, but in one or two instances make a special departure in the way of vivid dramatic effectiveness, more in keeping with the developed style of the nineteenth century, and this is heightened by the additional orchestral accompaniments from the hand of Mr. Hecht. The character of the execution of a new work—or, as in this instance, the first revelation of a time-honoured work—is always of vital consequence, and the performance under review was marked by a high state of intelligence, and bold, powerful treatment. This remark particularly applies to the chorus, which is always such an important factor in Handelian music, and the members added to their reputation by careful, well-balanced singing, always on the alert to take up their leads with promptitude, and ever conscious of the significance of their position in the evening's performance. The chorus "Ye tutelary gods," the swinging boisterous character of which was quite infectious, received a special share of verve and vigour of attack, and was redemanded. The principals comprised Mrs. Henschel, Madame Patey, Mr. Edward Lloyd, Mr. Henschel, and Mr. Bantock Pierpoint. Of these, Madame Patey and Mr. Lloyd particularly enhanced the success of the Concert by their finished artistic rendering of the dramatic recitatives allotted to them. The band, under Mr. Hallé's direction, ably supported the vocalists, and Mr. Best's assistance at the organ was invaluable.

Mr. Ross completed his short series of Concerts by a performance in the small Concert-room of St. George's Hall, on Saturday, the 5th ult., which served to introduce to Liverpool, in the capacity of solo violinist, M. Tivadar Nachéz. His chief selection was Wieniawski's Second Concerto, which is sufficiently difficult to put the executant to a high test. M. Nachéz, although perhaps somewhat deficient in repose and dignity, showed himself a master of technique, and roused the enthusiasm of the audience in his subsequent "Hungarian Dances." The orchestral work included the Overtures to "Oberon," "Nozze di Figaro," and Nicolai's popular "Merry Wives of Windsor." Mr. Ben Davies again proved himself a most capable and finished vocalist, earning an encore for a new song of Blumenthal's "Sleepest thou still, mine own?"

Miss Dora Schirmacher's annual Recital, an event without which the season's record would be incomplete, took place in the same hall on the following Saturday afternoon. Her programme was comprehensive and almost chronological, comprising Bach's Toccata and Fugue, Beethoven's Sonata quasi Fantasia in E flat, Brahms's Scherzo in E flat minor, and Schumann's "Carnaval." Of these the "Carnaval" certainly bears the palm for variety, and for the exacting demands which it makes upon the performer. It may, in fact, be taken as a standard which, if successfully attained, proves the sterling merit of the artist, and Miss Schirmacher certainly deserves such an encomium. Her playing throughout was distinguished by real sensitive force and sympathy, and the wonderful power of her left hand, aided by the tone of the instrument, a Blüthner, was the subject of general comment. We must not omit to mention that the fourth section of her programme was composed of some interesting little compositions of Miss Schirmacher's own writing, which were a nearer approach to genius than to mediocrity.

Another of the performances set on foot by the Cathedral Organist, Mr. F. H. Burstall, took place in St. Peter's Pro-Cathedral on the 15th ult., when Dr. Bridge's "Mount Moriah" and "Rock of Ages" were given. The occasion derived special interest from the fact that the composer himself presided at the organ, although, as previously remarked, the character of the instrument is not all that could be desired. The chorus numbered eighty voices, and the solos were on the whole efficiently rendered by the principals of the Cathedral choir.

One of the greatest events of the season, reserved to the last, is the visit of Herr Richter, with his splendid orchestra, but we must postpone any notice of the same until our next issue. The programme includes Beethoven's Choral Symphony, which will have the assistance of the Philharmonic Choral Society in its execution.

MUSIC IN THE WEST.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

The Grand Choral Night given in the Colston Hall, Bristol, on March 29, by the Monday Popular Concerts Society, was a most gratifying success. The citizens seemed to have been roused for once from their usual attitude of apathy towards fine music, and appeared in full force, filling the room as it ought to be filled at every one of the series of Concerts. The performance of Beethoven's Choral Symphony and Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" were certainly extraordinary attractions, but the event justified the enterprise on the part of the Conductor and the Society most fully. Mr. George Riseley's band and choir, numbering together 300 performers, were the forces relied upon for the greater part of the works, the solos being entrusted to Miss Agnes Larkcom, Madame Rosa Bailey, Miss Gane, Mr. Bernard Lane, and Mr. Montague Worlock. The choir had been rehearsing weekly for two months previously, under the alternate direction of Mr. Riseley and Mr. John Barrett, and every number had evidently received most careful study. There were two full rehearsals with the band, so that no effort was spared to ensure a worthy rendering of the noble works selected. The choir was very fairly balanced, the usual weakness in the alto part not being apparent, but seeming rather to have been transferred to the tenor, in which there was an occasional lack of sufficient body of tone, although the quality was very good. The sopranos were very numerous, and sang splendidly, coming triumphantly through the most trying passages of the Choral Symphony, notably the upper A, sustained through thirteen bars. As for the basses, upon whom so much depends in the Symphony, they showed themselves fully equal to their difficult task, and attacked their upper F's with great vigour, keeping moreover, well in tune. The usual roughness of the bass part was wonderfully toned down, and their pianissimo passages were quite exceptional. The "Hymn of Praise" was rendered magnificently throughout, there being no sort of hitch, the choir seeming to sing it absolutely by heart. The performance certainly ought to teach our city that nothing is beyond the reach of such a choir and band, directed as they are, by such a conductor as Mr. Riseley, and after the experience of March 29, we may safely anticipate with pleasure the performance of Dvorák's "Spectre's Bride," Mendelssohn's "Loreley," and a selection from Liszt's "Saint Elizabeth" to be given at the last Concert for the present season. The playing of the band in the Choral Symphony was even in excess of that of last year in excellence, and approached perfection. The band was led by Mr. Carrington, as usual, and the drums were entrusted to Mr. Smith, of the Crystal Palace orchestra. The solos were carefully sung, and Miss Larkcom especially deserves praise for her creditable rendering of a most trying part. Mr. Riseley was most warmly received, and once more exhibited his perfect mastery of the art of conducting.
